UI cracks down on fraternity drinking

The University of Idaho has served notice to fraternities across the state that they must conform with state law by Jan. 1. Fraternity and sorority presidents met last Sunday to review a proposal that would have banned alcohol at fraternity parties.

But Greek adviser Chris Wuthrich said the time for talk is over.

"The university is not going to debate with students," he said.

"The ball is in their court and the clock is ticking.

"We're going to wait to see what the students come up with before we take the next step to ensure compliance with the law."

Two weeks ago, Wuthrich predicted the school's Greek community would come to a vote by the end of October on a proposal to accept an alcohol policy similar to the school's dormitories.

"Right now we are still trying to figure out the best way for our house to fit into the plan," said John Carpenter, Delta Sigma Phi president. "I think the objective of the program is good, but it definite- ly would have been much smoother if we could have taken the time to put a program together with our help.

Greek advisor: University will not debate with students on alcohol policy

Police install cameras in Wallace lot

Andrea Lucero
Staff

Broken windows and flat tires will no longer be such common problems for students who use the Wallace Complex parking lot.

Surveillance cameras will soon be installed in the parking lot, thanks to the work of the University of Idaho Campus Police Station and fund-raising efforts. Three stationary cameras and one moveable camera will be set up to help identify vandalism and burglars.

"As soon as the lot went up, it became a prime target," explained Capt. Carl Wommack of the UI Campus Police Station.

Information from the cameras will be recorded on VCRs and monitored at the downtown police department. The cameras will function 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

"I think this kind of protection is really important and necessary," explained Jamie R. Retacek, senator. "I know a lot of people who have had problems in that lot.

The suggestion for a Wallace surveillance system was made more than a year ago. Since then, campus police have researched different types of equipment. They discussed their findings and received approval from members of Residence Hall Association, Parking Services and the Department of Administrative Affairs.

It just started to be a time of time to write reports about the vandalism and robberies. It didn't prevent anything or identify anyone. Video surveillance was the most effective solution," Wommack explained.

Tom Trail runs on experience

In 1971 I started work at WSU as an extension teacher and professor of agriculture. I worked for 23 years as a WSU... and 450 part-time students. During that time, we had a number of joint research projects that involved UI and WSU, and I was responsible for managing a $5 million budget...

I retired in 1994 from WSU and now have my own business, an international environmental consulting organization, that has contracts with the US Forest Service, WSU, and other universities and colleges. My brother and I manage our family farm, and we get a lot of experience, not only managing the farm, but we also have a small forestry operation on our Moscow property. My wife and I have been in-4 club leaders for 20 years. I've been a member of the Moscow Rotary club for 25 years and serving as its president. I'm a member of the Chamber of Commerce and the Latah County Fair Board...

I feel that I have educational and business experience that bring some strengths for running for political office.

As a candidate, I'll bring the following strengths to my campaign:

- I will focus on issues that are most important to the people of Idaho.
- I will be an effective advocate for the people of Idaho in the state legislature.
- I will work to improve the lives of all Idahoans.
- I will listen to the concerns of the people and work to address them.
- I will be a voice for the people of Idaho in the state legislature.

I believe that the people of Idaho deserve a representative who is dedicated to serving their needs and interests. I am committed to working hard to make Idaho a better place for all of us.

As a candidate, I will:

1. Work to create jobs and improve the economy of Idaho.
2. Fight for clean energy and a sustainable future for our state.
3. Protect our natural resources and ecosystems.
4. Strengthen our education system and support our schools.
5. Fight for a fair and equal tax system.
6. Support our communities and small businesses.
7. Be a strong voice for Idaho in the national capital.

I urge you to vote for me, Tom Trail, and work together to build a better future for Idaho, in 2022.

Sincerely,

Tom Trail

Idaho welfare changes affect students

Michelle Kalbteizer
Staff

The welfare system is undergoing major transformations in response to society's anxiety about the current system fostering dependence in its recipients.

"People see in denial, it's like they think it's happening in Washington D.C., and not in little old Moscow, Idaho. But it is happening here. They don't see it affecting them personally," said Bill Lott, welfare eligibility examiner for the Department of Health and Welfare Financial Services.

Lott says the changes in the system will definitely impact students, since 90 percent of Latah County households receiving assistance include at least one college student.

One of the biggest changes is food stamp eligibility. The new system allowed almost anyone to receive food stamps for an unlimited amount of time.

The revision states all able-bodied adults between 18-60 are eligible for three months out of a three-year period. This applies to people with no dependents and who are unemployed.

The Idaho Aid to Families with Dependent Children program is also placing a lifetime limit of two years on people receiving the AFDC grant. The federal government extends the limit to five years; however, the control is left to the individual states to mandate their own limits.

Idaho does count the length of time people receive welfare in other states toward the two-year limit.

Currently, there are families receiving $300 to $500. Under the revisions, the maximum amount of AFDC is set at $278 per month, regardless of family size.

In addition, AFDC and Medicaid will no longer be listed, so a person receiving AFDC will not automatically be covered by Medicaid. These changes are expected to be put into effect April 1 or July 1 of next year.

"Strengthening child support enforcement and going after 'dead-beat dads' is another priority of welfare reform," Lott said. Beginning January 1, 1997, anyone who fails to pay child support will have their licenses to drive, work, hunt, and fish suspended.

President Clinton signed the Welfare Reform Bill on Aug. 22. Each state is required to submit their individual proposals on welfare reform by July 1, 1997. States will face reduced funding from the federal government if they ignore Clinton's request.

Gov. Phil Batt responded by forming the Welfare Reform Advisory Council. This Council studied Idaho's welfare system in depth and then developed 44 proposals to make improvements.

Eventually, AFDC and food stamps will become electronic benefits. Recipients will use something resembling a credit card to access money deposited by the government into the account each month.

Anyone interested in the impact of welfare reform on the business community should attend a program hosted from 11:30 a.m. to 1 p.m. at the Moscow Community Center.

ly has its ups and downs.

Many fraternity houses now have policies that allow for drinking only by those 21 or older. But in practice, Wuthrich said, the parties are attended by minors who consume alcohol.

"There is an obvious difference between what we are doing now and the last alcohol policy. It is an important issue that definitely needs to be dealt with," said Joseph Peavey, vice president of Phi Kappa Alpha.

Neither the school nor the Alumni Greek Council has any power to force the fraternities to move one way or the other. But, Wuthrich said the school can exert "leverage."

If some fraternities do not go along, the school could refuse to recognize them.

"When you don't recognize them, they can't do business," Wuthrich said. A chapter that is not in good standing at a host university will find it difficult, if not impossible, to get insurance.

The students say an alcohol-free Greek Row will force the parties off campus and perhaps create an even bigger problem. All sororities are dry and at least one fraternity prohibits alcohol.

"Basically, we don't really like the fact that the university is trying to impose more rules and restrictions," said Matt O'Connell, Farmhouse president. "Our house is already dry, but we are supporting the rest of the Greek system. We all see the writing on the wall and just want to make sure no one is taking advantage of it."

UI is one of five universities nationwide targeted for a pilot project to have dry Greek Rows.

legislature for real, responsible reforms, and make sure the people we elect at the federal level aren't adding to the problem.

"Everyone is for property tax reform," former Governor Andrus added, "but Proposition One is bad for the people. The burden will fall upon the general fund to make up that property tax money. Higher education will take it right in the neck!"

Even though Idaho is a traditionally conservative state by national standards, both Andrus and Williams believe that stereotype is not overly realistic.

"The label of East Coast liberal just doesn't stick," Andrus said, because "all Democrats are not Ted Kennedy."

Andrus used his political career, which included four terms as governor, as an example of a successful Democrat in Idaho.

"When I started out during the depression," Andrus continued, "it was F.D.R. and Harry Truman. That is the type of Democratic principles I am very familiar with.

Just because I am a Democrat, that doesn't mean I am a wild big-spender. It all depends upon the individual, so don't judge Dan Williams by an East Coast label."

"If Idahoans get to know me, instead of some figment of Helen Chenoweth's imagination, they'll recognize a Democrat in the western Idaho pragmatic tradition," Williams said. "I think that the people are hungry for a problem solver and a consensus builder, and not a cheerleader for either extreme."

Don’t lose your term paper to a power surge

The age of computers is upon us, intended to make life easier but, in reality, life just got that much more difficult.

Relying on computers to store and process all of your information is like putting all our eggs in one basket. If the computers go down, all the information is lost.

No one knows better than my roommate who has spent five or more hours typing on her computer presentation, lost the entire thing due to a computer “error.” For some reason the darn thing wouldn’t save, and she lost it all. She had to start over again from where she left off.

Another situation involves a friend of mine who lost most of his story he was writing because his surge protector didn’t work. One flick of the lights, and he was back to square one.

What happened to the good ol’ days when we used pen and paper, storing our files in a cabinet? There will come a day when we long for those days and damn the name of Bill Gates.

Several new computer programs are designed to make life quick and easy, hence the name “Quicken” for the money-management computer program. They should call it “Slower” for the amount of time it takes to figure it out. I have enough trouble remembering to keep my check register up to date. Who wants to re-record it on this computer? To me the program is only a glorified calculator.

I’m not saying computers are no good. On the contrary, computers are great, especially for writing papers. I love to be able to compose and rewrite my teletype righters off the computer screen. It is so much easier than trying to pound it out on a typewriter. But computer compositions do give way to laziness. I admit, there have been times when I wrote a paper, ran spell check and called it good. Somehow we think computer-written papers don’t need to be checked for mis-takes after they roll off the printer.

Also, there’s the chance you might lose the paper all together if you keep in just on a disk or your hard drive. My history professor always asks us to keep a hard copy of every paper we write for her, just in case.

I always like to have something real in front of me, instead of “virtual” information. Imagine a class taken completely on computer. While this may seem like the dream class to some, it wouldn’t replace the real-life interaction you get in a classroom. If all your homework was handed in over the Internet, how would you know you really did any work? How could you prove you did the work, in the event the assignment was lost over the wire? Where would the professor make the little red marks? You’d never get your paper back.

Computers are great for what they do, but they are not the solution to all of our problems. If we put everything into computers we risk losing it.

No, I’m not afraid of computers, just the paper.

on their televisions and pause in tinker- ing with their Volkswagens long enough to laugh themselves into pools of mirth-induced drool in incredulity not that someone would suggest “it,” but that some of their own would actually get off their cars long enough to come “it” to come about.

This “it” is revolution. Revolution. The “Breakaway Pashandle,” as it would surely be called by the pack journalists in the controversy-hun- gry local and national media. is North Idaho versus all others (princi- pally by barricading the U.S. 95 Salmon River Bridge with a human chain of patriots) with the whore of the South: the rest of Idaho.

Problem is, who would notice?

Bigger problem: Who would care.

Frankly, I think this so-called North Idaho (Motto: Eta Rolidula; This is completely mumbo jumbo just don’t have the moxie to get the jug- gernaut rolling past the knick of a brickean store. That’s because these loud-speaking but soft-airing ascensionists—who owe as much to their rhetoric to Helen Cheuwas and environmental ter- rorists as they do Randy Weaver— are in a minority smaller than that of the Potlatch Young Democrats.

It’s easy to sit on a porch or in front of a television set and whine about how great Idaho could be if the Salmon River formed more than an ideological barrier between North and South. There’s nothing wrong with North Idaho that being, a part of Washington wouldn’t fix these people whimper to the Spokesman Review, which eagerly laps up their potentially explosive sentiment for dills on story rights. What comes hard to these inco-patients is putting action to word. They cling like old wrinkled men to brown moonshine jugs to the anti- quated, reactionary myth that the West was Idaho. The name James and Wyatt Earp still exist in the most heavily urbanized section of the country per capita — and the closest most of us get to the heart of the western wilderness is through crawling along some Forest Service trail marked out by the thousands of Power Bar wrappers that have trampled there before us.

Prop. Two: A better deal for hunters and hunted

Looks like cooler weather has turned this into a great deer and elk season and not a uni- versal thing, of course, but for a whole lot of folks all over the coun- try, fall and hunting season go together like hot coffee and cold morning.

They love the chance to get out and enjoy the beautiful in your own countrysid, swap some gossip with their hunting buddies and just maybe fill up the old deep freeze at the same time. Most hunters don’t mind the fall at all, the fall hunting season at all, and they respect the conservation issues involved. It’s to make sure the animals born in the spring are independent before their any risk of being taken as game. This cuts down on needful meat and insures that our deer and elk popula-

The vast majority of hunters also respect the fact that hunting is a sport and not a tak. That’s what makes it fun after all. Anyone can go out with a spotlight and blow deer away as they stand fastened in her face. But is unsportsmanlike, and that’s reason enough to have spotlighting and methods like it. This spirit of good sportsmanship gives deer and elk and hunting a positive image, attracts thousands of Idahoans each year, and ensures that they’ll be able to enjoy your enjoyment for generations to come. So why should black bear hunting be a completely different case?

Why should hunters want, much less be allowed by the general public, to hunt the animals in the spring when they’re raising young cubs, using fondness and basic

All Proposition Two — sponsored by the Idaho Coalition United for Bears would do is make bear hunters follow some sensible ground rules that will only insure a stable bear population, not infringe on any real hunter’s rights. I say “real” hunters because using bait and snares doesn’t resemble the real sports hunting to most peo-

It’s more like squatting. Along the same lines, establishing a fall — just bear season is in order. Management, it will reduce the number of cubs left to starvation due to being not yet able to fend for themselves when their mother was killed by sports hunters.

These are the only issues Proposition Two would raise. If there’s bear baiting, it ban using baits to hunt bears and it ends spring hunt-

In other words, it just puts bear hunters into the same category as deer and elk hunters, and denies them dubious special rights and privileges that true sportsmen don’t want anyway.

The details of these special rights afforded bear hunters are: 1) The right to leave a drum or pit of rotten food or animal parts in the woods and then shoot bears that come to feed — that’s bear baiting. 2) The right to have dogs, often equipped with radio telemetry equipment, waiting until the bears are paced and then killing it as it marches like a sitting duck on a tree limb. And 3) The right to kill bears in the spring if they are unaccompanied by cubs. Of course, since the men often leave their cubs in a protected place while searching for food, nursing females will often be taken legally even though the result will be young unemployed cubs that are often either starve, as mentioned previously, or fall victims to other predators.

As you can plainly see, Proposition Two doesn’t pose a threat to real bear hunters and real sportsmen. Fall bear season will still be open every year just as deer and elk season are. As a matter of fact, in Colorado, where an initia-

Unfortunately, there’s a well-funded group called objecting to the Sportsmen’s Heritage Fund that is doing its best to distort the issue. The name itself is a docile, riot. Deer and elk hunters and the vast majority of bear hunters really do defend Idaho’s hunting heritage. They follow sensible rules and have a great time. They’re true sportsmen. These real hunters should be the ones who voice their concerns on Proposition Two.

So whether you’re a hunter or not, give it some thought. Look at the realities, not the propaganda of this

Occasionally there is a resurgence of a particular style of music. Corporate trends usually latch on to new bands with an alarmingly quick speed to put out bands playing music that could be described as "fresh." Punk broke in the '70s with bands such as the Sex Pistols capturing the media's attention. Country-western also gained popularity in the late '80s through music artists such as Rhinestone Cowboy. Both of these genres have "come back" so to speak in the '90s. MTV has caught the "alternative" bug, and somehow punk got swept up and commercialized. Country music found Garth Brooks, a deaf millionaire, and brought a new old dog to rise to the back of the former country-deficient musical F-150. ska, a musical genre that has endured since the 1940s, is coming back in no small way. Bands like Rancid, No Doubt and Goldfinger have led the way on the MTV front, and the public is buying it. What remains unaddressed is ska never really went away.

The Jamaican bands in the '60s and '70s covered early rock 'n' roll and dancehall songs, implementing the traditional Jamaican upbeat. Bob Marley started playing the same time, and eventually became a star as Desmond Dekker, and initially played ska. It wasn't until the year 2000 that ska started slowly down the beat that reggae was invented. One reggae had a firm foothold in Jamaica, ska died out a little, and reggae music became popular in Britain. As it tends to go with changing interests, the youth of Britain looked to the roots of reggae for new inspiration, and ska bands such as the Specials provided the soundtrack for the mods.

The music, listed in the public eye as about as mods did, and ska once again died out. Shortly thereafter, however, bands in the late '70s started what is known as the "Third Wave." Bands like Madness, Chilli隨 Fish and, later, Operation Ivy and Skank's Pickle started a ska underground that has spread on both coasts of the country.

The "Come Out Swingin'" tour was a perfect synthesis of the old and new. Reel Big Fish, a young band from Orange Country, CA. Let's Go Bowling, a classic traditional ska band from the East Coast, and Cherry Poppin' Daddies, a swingin' ska band from Portland, OR. brough the old, the new and the innovative together at Outback Jack's in Spokane last Saturday, Oct. 19.

Reel Big Fish kicked things off with a powerfully silky set. These guys play ska music and it shows. Their career is just starting, and they are the perfect victims for exploitation, but their integrity will most likely keep them insulated from this. It's hard to sell something to somebody when the potential customer doesn't take you seriously; it's almost impossible to sell a product that doesn't take you seriously. As RBF says, "I'll never be a rock and roll star. I'll never be selling all at all."

All eight members of RBF were having a blast playing, and they were tight, too. It's hard to keep a band that big together, but they pulled it off with no problems at all. They started out their set with "Join the Club," a quick little diddy about starting a band and never letting up.

The music was right on target through "Say Ten," "Alternative Girlfriends," "Bees," all from their most recent album, Turn the Radio Off, and their ultra-lounge cover of "Hungry Like the Wolf" brought a whole new meaning to Duran Duran. The guitar ground into a massive wall of horns and left Washes swinging the dance floor. By the time they wrapped things up with "Everything Sucks," the crowd had slackened itself to a drunken frenzy, and Let's Go Bowling couldn't set it fast enough.

The LGB set was surprisingly exuberant. Traditional ska is much mellower compared to the ska-core that Reel Big Fish belted out, but Let's Go Bowling put in all they had, and the crowd was glad to get it. The set started out with the little track from their latest album, Mr. Twiste, and wound through classic Skatelines and Damsen Dekker covers to end up at "Bad 99." From the Music to Bond by album, Tavis and Grant of Reel Big Fish joined the band on stage to provide a butt-blowing horn section for the song. "Cherry Poppin' Daddies are always a favorite in Spokane, and they play it up to that fact. "Daddies," as they affectionately called, brought together the distinct styles of the previous bands perfectly. They ranged from swinging big band sounds to guitar-oriented ska-core and romped all over the spectrum.

Horns blared on "Drunk Daddy," "I was a Teenage Brain Surgeon," and "Dr. Bones," and guitar嗣mitted on "Kids in the Street" and "Don Quixote." The crowd liked them so much that they played an encore of "Nothing." If you missed the show this time, have no fear. Tavis says lamprey for Reel Big Fish, says RBF will be back through the areas sometime next month on a tour with their libellulises, Goldfinger. You can find information about the tour, as well as RBF and Goldfinger's music, by going to <http://www.mojorecords.com>.

Once again, not Everything Sucks

CD Review

Everything Sucks, the self-released debut album of Reel Big Fish, proved the band wrong. Not everything sucks, and things suck a lot less since the release of Turn the Radio Off, the band's first album on Mojo Records. There are eight members of Reel Big Fish: Aaron Barrell, vocals and guitar; Matt Wong, bass; Andrew Eier(<hing; Carl A newer, trumpet; and Steve Kugfors, trumpet and vocals. Not only is enough people to make a soft-core film, play Olympic-size baseball from the parking lot, or dirty a marine, but it makes for a sonic barrage of ska-punk bliss that's enough to shake you out of your seat if you aren't already marshin' it up for your worth.

The album, recorded with the assistance of Gong Bebe bassist John Avila, starts out in typical RBF style with "Sell Out." These guys may have gotten a little more popular, but they aren't any more troubles with the idea of becoming big R&B's sell out. Unfortunately, it looks like the public isn't going to give them a chance, and as they observe, "I can't work in fast food all my life."

From here they shoot into two songs from Everything Sucks, "Trendy," and "Join the Club." Although this album is pretty much Everything Sucks with five songs taken off and four new songs, RBF did a good job re-recording them. They have refined their style but not lost their edge, as is apparent in "She Has a Girlfriend Now," which is reminiscent of Dance Hall Crushers with Monique Powell, from Sav fells, on guest vocals. "Beer" gives us insight as to why the band may be called Reel Big Fish, although Barrell insists, "It's from that famous line at the end of Casablanca, you know, 'The problems of some small people can build up into a bill of beans in this big mett fish."" The band also claims their name dates back in rock history to 1969 and can be heard in Brando's "Stella" scene when played backwards, plus think banjo concepts, which is assisted by Efren Santana from Hepcat. "Stoopy Dog, Baby" is born from a dumb riff from the old stand. These "3 Blind Mice." The tribute to vegetarianism, "Say Ten," features Barrell doing an impressive Chuck D. "All the vegans in the house!" "Everything Sucks" did not appea in their first album, but here they take the opportunity to sing about how much a little ska band down the street just sucks, but everybody loves 'em. Love is a touchy subject with the band. Barrell's version of the chorus of "Beer" - "I'll get drunk, well, I'll pass out on the floor now, baby, and you won't bother me no more." — is just "Alternative Baby" — "(play little alternative girl, don't you wanna be my friend? Y'know I'm in it all my songs for you, and it's alright if you don't understand" — which is made up in every song.

Turn the Radio Off has earned Reel Big Fish a moment in the spotlight. There's a video for "Everything Sucks" on MTV, and they have been touring with some of the biggest bands in ska music today. They may have been wrong in singing, "I'll never be a rock and roll star," but they won't be followed up with, "The radio plays what you want to hear," and how much longer will it take before the industry realizes who their fans are?

Once again, not Everything Sucks
If you are one of those perfect people, who have never done anything stupid in their life, this article is not for you. For those of you humans left making this, it might make you feel better about yourself to read the things others have been documented with doing. A new book from Main Street Books by Doublenut provides perhaps the best example of dumb stuff people have done, cleverly titled, The 176 Stupidest Things Ever Done.

This book, by Ross and Kathryn Petras, is following in the footsteps of their bestseller, The 176 Stupidest Things Ever Said, as well as several other books, and an annual calendar. This brother-sister duo feels there is somewhat of a science to compiling information for a book of this nature. They've made efforts to cover every different category of stupid. The book includes examples of insane incidences committed by even celebrities such as Charles Barkley, Ronald Reagan and Fabio. This is a fabulously funny compilation of farcical feats guaranteed to make anyone and everyone laugh.

A few of this reviewer's favorite stories from the book are, for example, the one about a failed Chinese contraception program which actually causes the birthrate to rise. It is discovered that men are taking birth-control pills and unrolling condoms over their fingers, exactly as shown in the training film.

Then there's the one about a man fishing on the Amazon's Rio Negro. His line got stuck in a tree and when he finally pulled it loose, he discovered it had been caught on a bees nest. These bees were now irritated and began to swarm toward him. Desperate to get away from the stinging bees, he leaped into the river. He was devoured immediately by piranhas. Oops.

The one about an elderly woman walking her poodle in Los Angeles one night is good, too. The woman was mugged, shoved to the ground, and forced to give her purse to a mugger. Ironically enough, the only thing in her purse was a plastic bag she had just used to pick up after her dog with.

There are several other amusing special sections in the book as well. They've included stupid things done by the government, scientific inventions they feel the world couldn't have done without, stupid songs, and lunatic laws, among others.

Ross and Kathryn Petras are still compiling similar incidents for a sequel to this book. They encourage anyone knowing of or having done anything monumentally stupid to send it in to them: Ross and Kathryn Petras, c/o Doubleday, 1540 Broadway New York, NY 10036.

So after a truly awful day full of saying dumb things in class, stumbling up a flight of stairs, or feeling a little down, this book could provide the comic relief needed to brighten your day. The shortcomings of others, if for no other good, should be looked at as an example that no matter how stupid the things you do, someone's always out there doing something far worse.

Yet another 'stupid' book published

Sweet Valley High goes cyberpunk

David Camden-Britton

It was Becky's first day of school, and it had been a really awful one. The big football hero had laughed at her when she spilled her lunch tray, and the prom queen made fun of her hair. Becky was not amused, and today was going to be different. You see, Becky had backed into the private banking services employed by the prom queen's parents and made a few deductions. And wouldn't that football hero be shattered when the digitally edited photos of him performing fellatio on his coach were published the next morning in the newspaper. Becky was glad she had gotten a computer for Christmas instead of a make-over.

Perhaps this isn't the start of a new Sweet Valley High book, but The Lurker Files bear no little resemblance to those unamy bits of junior high fiction. In defense of the book, allow me to state that this is from an ongoing project based on the World Wide Web (WWW).

It appears that this web site has been collection story ideas and the readers of the page have had a hand in shaping the direction of the novel. As this has been packaged in a young adult's story, I cannot but compare it with its source. The content is quite suitable for a junior high or early high school audience who may want a mystery novel that is right up their demographic alley. For readers looking for an engaging mystery, this book falls short.

The Lurker Files is filled with several vaguely-detailed characters that interact in a tepid way, and eventually the story makes its semi-riveting conclusion. The only character of prime interest is the Lurker itself (the genius is obvious from the story, how nicely PC). This being appears to exist on a portion of a college's network system and has various and controls users through a virus, if techheads can obtain — a thinly veiled example for younger audiences interested in the power of computers. As a novel for young adults, some of the concepts are rather outdated, even at that age.

First, the character of the “jock with a heart of gold” has been used the same with the "ice queen sorority girl who turns out to be nice in the end.” I believe that a whole host of movies using these very structures were filmed in the mid-'80s.

The time is gone, let it go. Perhaps I'm setting my age structure a bit too high, perhaps this book was intended for children in elementary school. Those 5th- and 6th-graders will enjoy the stories of a group of characters involved in different adventures such as a group of college students who become stalked via the local computer network. Their efforts to find and free herself from a web of intrigue are

Students: Did you like the 9.28% fee increase this year?

Neither did I! I voted against the legislation which resulted in this fee increase.

Because of inadequate funding from the legislature, the Board of Education voted to increase student fees. In fact, between 1976 and 1996, student fees have risen from 6.4% to 18% of the higher education budget. Students are forced to carry an ever growing share of this burden.

This is a terrible trend. As a U of I graduate, I believe the best thing we can do for Idaho's future is to keep the cost of a college education affordable enough for everyone.

My opponent said he would have voted for these inadequate budgets which have resulted in increasing student fees. Do you want a Senator who accepts whatever is offered, or a Senator with the courage to vote against inadequate higher education budgets?

I will continue to fight for the students, staff and faculty of the University of Idaho!

Last week, the previews for New Line Cinema’s latest release, The Long Kiss Goodnight, told us to “kiss everything we know about traditional action films goodbye.” In the immortal words of the rap tag Team, “bring it back, y’ll, bring it back.” Yes, bring back any notions of believing this movie could break any long-standing action flick barriers. Relax, any amount of esteem you may have held for director Renny Harlin. And re-evaluate any hopes that an audience could go the length of an entire action movie without noticing at least one gasoline-related explosion.

Contradictory as this may sound, The Long Kiss Goodnight is not exactly a bad movie. It’s just like every other high-budget film whose plot goes nowhere but is Fortunately filled with a plethora of hip one-liners and lots of quick-kits. The film opens innocently enough with Samantha Caine (played by Geena Davis), her boyfriend and her daughter, Caitlin, living a picture-perfect life in a small Normat Rockwell-type town. All that changes, though, as Samantha — who had amnesia and doesn’t remember anything that happened past eight years ago — has a couple traumatic accidents that set off a gradual chain of memory refreshment.

Samantha discovers her real name is Charly Baltimore and that she used to be an assassin trained by the United States government, who wants her dead now that she’s resurrected. Aided by private detective Mitch Henry (Samuel L. Jackson), Charity wreaks havoc upon all who try to detain her, her blushed hair and her pointed-on Cindy Crawford mode.

Like its formulaic action film predecessors, The Long Kiss Goodnight relies heavily upon explostons, a fast pace and a glut of potty-mouth humor. Every so often, though, we get a unique scene or two. Davis strapped to a waterwheel and getting repeatedly doused and held underwater is a thankfully uncommon type of torture. Also, to the film’s credit set a couple of other action sequences, most notable of which is Charity’s mid-full shaving of a frozen pond to “cushion” her and Mitch’s landing.

The rest of the few real bright spots are the result of the character of Mitch. Jackson’s sardonic wit and sarcastic comments about Charity’s evolving attitude play nicely off the latter’s almost silly toughness. Also, fans of the television show, “The Kids in the Hall,” will recognize a Helen Hodies (Agnie) skit.

In fact, however, the film is jam-packed with swiss cheese-stuffed holes, as well as a fair share of inconsistencies in the plot. Believing that a helicopter could suddenly appear on a quiet farm — or even a crowded city street, for that manner — without making a noticeable sound is a stretch. And if you think that Geena Davis could really out-ice skate a speeding car, then there’s something very wrong with you. The final 15 minutes of the movie meet all expectations. Timothy, Charity’s nemesis and one-time lover, goes down in a blaze of combustion, but not before he reveals to her every detail of his sinister bombing scheme in a style reminiscent of so many “Scooby Doo” episodes. Of course, Charity, Mitch and Callie all go free to fight another day.

For director Renny Harlin, this is a definite step up from his last effort, Constantine, but then again, so is a hard slip in the face. As for Davis, she should probably shy away from assassin charac- ter and concentrate on parts such as her Oscar-winning role in The Accidental Tourist. Her character is never really frightening, just psychotic and unbelievable. The least she could do is stick with comedies like Beetlejuice or Heath, to which she had moderate success. If you want to have any sort of connection to this movie, go out and buy the soundtrack. It’s laced with various motos, funk and swingin’ rock from the ’70s that complement Mitch’s pimp ensembles quite well. However, not even the best of pimp could solicit me to watch this movie again.

"Pistachio" by Jeremy Barlow

No, what Pistachio wanted was to be a hard-as-nail adventurer sans strings. Like a scoop-chazed Howdy Doody. A madcap marionette with an eye for detail and a nose for trouble. Clear of talking insects, particularly crickets. Pistachio had a perfect plan. But the plan hit a few snags. First, the supreme beings, the ones who determine a six-year-old's fate, mother and father, had shown their inability to comprehend such a masterpiece that was Pistachio's reverie. "That's nice, dear," didn't quite measure up to the response befiting such a dream. Pistachio demanded nothing short of astonishment, borderline worship of someone, especially at such a young age, could have such inspired plots of brats that rivaled Morphus himself.

But it was a complex, unimaginative world, and Pistachio knew that. Known in order to create such a miracle as child to puppet anthropomorphism, it would take certified miracle worker intervention. And there was only one miracle maker with credentials to even be considered—The Big Guy from Up Above. Up above being the North Pole, and the Big Guy—well I'm sure you know the rest.

It was much to Pistachio's chagrin when even the Big Guy himself couldn't understand or share Pistachio's passion. The Big Guy couldn't comprehend that Pistachio didn't just want a puppet for the Big Guy, he wanted to be the marionette. When the Big Guy pushed to find the motivation behind what he referred to as "the cutest thing he had ever heard," Pistachio, in disgust, got up and walked away. Months went by. Months full of cutting and pasting. Reading and revising. Picturing and planning. Pistachio had not lost faith. His parents had been a bit down. The Big Guy, an even bigger disappointment.

But Pistachio had a wild card, something he had seen on television, an organization dedicated to fulfilling the wishes of children with terminal or life-threatening illness—The Make a Wish Foundation. They granted miracles. To most of the bed ridden and/or radiated balding nuns that were chosen by the foundation, a miracle was buying a new television, or hunting an endangered bear. That made Pistachio sick. Unfortunately not sick enough to be considered terminally.

There was only one thing left to do, get the Big C. Cancer. Little Jimmy Reynolds, who hadn't been seen around school for a few weeks, according to rumors dropped mother-to-mother phone calls around the valley. Perfect.

- The Plan. Sneak into Jimmy's room, catch leukemia, play it up, get the Make a Wish Foundation, make a wish, become a puppet. Almost too easy, it was perfect. Almost. Looking at Little Jimmy, pale, bald lying in his bed, light cross-eyed, he thought partially closed Venetian blinds, Pistachio knew he had been cheated. He found out the hard way that little Jimmy Reynolds was quarantined because he was weak and under supervision, not because he was contagious.

Inflated, Pistachio walked home. It wasn't fair. He had been good all year for the Big Guy, no dice. Worked hard keeping his room clean for the supernatural beings, nada. Now the Make a Wish Cancer scenario was out too. It just wasn't fair.

Walking home from little Jimmy's, Pistachio, caught up in the whys and hows of his most recent failure, didn't notice the drunk piloted 1978 Lincoln Towncar that was bearing down on him as he crossed the street. He didn't have time to notice it. The car was on top of him before his second little six-year-old felt left to the curb.

Six months later, early in the morning, Pistachio came out of his coma. Light cross-eyed the room through partially closed Venetian blinds. Pistachio tried to look around but couldn't. His body cocooned in brightly colored plastic. A harness, fastened to the ceiling, held him vertically, his back had been heaved and the best thing for the patient's spine was to remain in an upright position. Wires, tubes, and other hospital things that Pistachio had seen on the television but could not identify by reading from above. As Pistachio looked at himself in a mirror across the room—his body cast harnessed, suspended in mid-air and painted to look like his cartoon marionette hero, his arms frozen in plaster and propped in front of him, arrowed tubes and wiring stretched from above and attached to his limbs—a tear ran down his cheek. This was not the way he intended, he had gotten his wish.

Of course, assuming you are of a somewhat higher reading age, this book might be amusing and would certainly pass the time between classes nicely. Priorities: K-12 education. expand funding for classroom technology and teachers' salaries. Higher Education: ensure U of I's role as a premier learning and research institute.
Eradicate the lame party blues

There are few things more associated with drinking than books. Nothing dispenses what looks to be a real party bust than a spirited game of Slush Fund or Burnout.

The veritable encyclopedia of these beer contests. The Complete Book of Beer Drinking Games, has been revised for the third time, and is currently in stores.

The book lists old favorites known to beer gamers nation-wide even world-wide, while still adding some that may or may not be new to the reader, depending on how knowledgeable as a beer drinker, the potential drinker is.

The authors, Andy Griscom, Ben Rand and Scott Johnstone, a t' of lads who have been out of college for over 10 years now, cover just about everything from beer game etiquette to a list of past presidents who have consumed the golden liquid — all in the tongue-in-cheek format — to almost 80 different ways to say drunk.

The guys divide the over 50 games into five different categories, each according to a "Beer Factor" ("food" means fun, for the inexperienced beer drinker). If a game has a factor of 1, there is minimal risk of puking, while a 5-factor game guarantees an almost assured trip to the porcelain princess. This grouping strategy, while done before in similar books, is still quite notable, especially when the games have been going on for an hour or more. Nothing is more frustrating than trying to locate a favorite game when your arteries are like Alaskan pipelines of alcohol.

The Complete Book of Beer Drinking Games covers the wide gamut of games, some of which merely require cards, domes or even just a 12-pack. Others, such as "Beer Golf," "Beer Softball" or "Volley Pong" necessitate the use of specific locales and equipment. What is also unique to this work of literature is the way the authors jokily point out all the small but relevant ways in which the games succeed or can be changed.

Take "Beer Softball" for instance. They maintain that the classic version requires players must drink at least half a beer at each base they touch. However, they inform us, additional rules may be added, such as the existence of a "Beer Bimbo," a younger brother or sister who keep the cups full and any and all kegs pumped. Had Babe Ruth played this form of ball, they eventually inform us, "he would have been a hot pitcher."

The book also throws in a warning about drinking and driving, which seems appropriate considering some of the games in Beer Factor 5 — "Beer Hunter," "Kill the Keg," "The 100 Beer Cub..." Dispensed throughout the book are various lus and short essays which make for entertaining reading in between hard-core visits. The university of the "mung rag" (the blow-out towel), numerous synonyms for vomiting and even "25 movies to drink to" are featured here.

The Complete Book of Beer Drinking Games is textbook stuff for those who are tired of textbooks. It's a great book for parties and a great read for alcoholics, unless you don't want to be an alcoholic, in which case, don't buy this book. Any way you cut it though, it's hard to have a group of guys whose favorite cheap beer is the same one I went through high school pouring down my throat — Black Label.

Stephen King censored in schools and libraries

Stephen King may be one of the best-selling writers of all time, but he has his adversaries. According to the American Library Association, King and Judy Blume are the two most often challenged and banned authors in schools and libraries.

"Carrie" challenged at Clark High school library in Las Vegas in 1975 as "trash." "Cujo": Removed from the shelves of the Bradford, N.Y., school library in 1985 "because it was a bunch of garbage," "Salem's Lot": Banned from the English class of Cleveland, Texas, Independent High School even after teachers had inked out objectionable words with a felt tip.

The list goes on and on. "Does not meet community standards," "Inappropriate for the occult." "Urge children to rebel." "Taxes a mockery of Christianity."

Stephen has spent much of his career deriding the criticism he's received. But recently, he has not been so in love with his books being censored. After a group of parents at a school in Maine tried to ban the books, King published an open letter in which he wrote:

"Overriding all the specific complaints is the superfluous element of the book," says Judith King, director of the ACLU Office for Intellectual Freedom. "Even when it's not supernatural, he gives the impression that it's not really the world in which we live. It conjures up images and views. And sometimes it's downright scary. People don't like that.

And what does the prolific author say: "What I tell kids is don't get mad (about censorship), get even." King said as a recent recent conference at the University of Maine. "Run, don't walk, to the first library you can find, and read what they're trying to keep out of your eyes, and what they're trying to keep out of your brains, because that's exactly what you need to know."

It appears to be unanimous. Inanimate objects are united in their perception of the presidential race. Let this be a clear message to the people in Washington, D.C.

1/3c instant powdered milk
1/4c sugar
1/2 tsp salt
1/4 tsp baking powder
1/4 tsp baking soda
1/8 tsp pepper
1 tsp water
1 tbs vegetable oil

Mix cornmeal, soy flour, powdered milk, sugar, onion powder, salt, pepper, and enough water to form a thick dough. Place oil in a deep, narrow pot. Heat oil slowly for several minutes until very hot. Temperature is correct when a small ball made of test batter dropped into the hot oil, babbles vehemently. Form batter into 3/4-inch balls and place several of them into the hot oil, being sure to cover pot with a lid. Outdoor books at Bookpeople

Heather Haille McCoy
Staff

Because late it's weather hasn't been inviting us outside, it's time to check out the endless supply of outdoor books down at Bookpeople on Main Street in Moscow.

Unfortunately, our strolling summer has come to a bitter end; the temperatures have dropped and rain falls. The outdoors can still be brought indoors so don't hibernate completely.

When Bob Greene, the owner of Bookpeople, was asked about his outdoor section, his face lit up at the opportunity to discuss his selection of outdoor books. As he led me to the back of his store, we passed a small brown and white dog curled upon the rust-colored carpet. On the wooden shelves above the dog, I saw the possibility for my entire day to be spent pawing through the pages of books ranging from birds and wildlife to rafting, camping, horseriding and snowboarding.

Bookpeople has an extensive collection of books about birds. Greene claims that bird watching is one of the fastest growing hobbies in the United States. Perhaps this is why he has about 70 different bird guides. Also, he has Flash-Guides — foldable weather-resistant pamphlets — ideal for taking out in the field to identify common birds.

Outside sportsbooks also reside in Bookpeople's collection. Different types of both cooking and nature cooking can be learned through reading the books. For those who fish, The Complete Fish on the Grill, by Pamela Kay and Sue Ward, could give you some new ideas. For hikers, The Art of the Picnic, by Pamela Kay and Sue Ward, undoubtedly will give you some insight on your next venture. And, for all berry-pickers, Wild and Free — A Cookbook and Guide to Northwest Blackberries, by Karlie Felton, will help make your next berry search successful.

Bookpeople also has plenty of books on hiking. In the Moscow area, some have had a difficult time finding good places to hike, because as much of the land that surrounds us is privately owned. Bookpeople offers books that have great places to hike that aren't extremely far away. Let's Go! Day Trip in Idaho Around the Palouse, by Darlene Croteau, offers many interesting historical and easily accessible outdoor sites within a 50-mile radius. This book is excellent for families with children or elderly members, but most experienced hikers feel that the trails are too easy.

Other hiking guides found in Greene's store offer more challenging areas. Greene thinks that a new hiker's guide to northern Idaho is in high demand. Because of all of the logging roads and changes that have occurred over the last few years, some of the trail guides are now outdated.

Hiking Hot Springs in the Pacific Northwest, by Evie Litton, Umbrella Guide to Northwest Natural Hot Springs, by Tom Blackshear and N. Keith, and Hot Springs and Hot Pools of the Northwest, by Marjorie Gerst Young, all describe some not too far from Moscow with hot springs. Some of these are developed, so clothing is required and some are not, so the land is perfectly acceptable.

Bookpeople's books on Mountain Biking are also very popular. Local authors have written books like Jim Larkin's Mountain Bike Guide to Hogs Heaven — Moscow River Mill to Ponderosa Creek State Park. This book is especially insightful for those looking for a new spot to bike. Books on rafting also grace Bookpeople's shelves. River rafting

Bob Greene, owner of Bookpeople, information on Idaho, Montana, Oregon, and other nearby states can be found in here. These books can offer help in deciding where to go, how to call, where to camp, regulations, distances, and maps of the rivers. Each of the river rafting books are different. Every author has their own unique perception of the rivers.

After flipping through the pages of the few books I had time for, I tinged to get out and go berry-picking, hiking, horseriding or rafting. Piles of colorful books filled with endless information about the outdoors surrounded me. Each book contains different spots to go. One would have to dedicate hours of their life if they ever wanted to read all of the different outdoor books that are in Bookpeople's outdoor selection.

Greene reminded me that I'd need a map to know how to get to my desired locations. Although they don't carry topographical maps, Bookpeople has a wonderful collection of road maps for Idaho and other states as well. Idaho atlases and road maps for the western states as well as Canada can all be found.

Greene insists on having as much information about the outdoors as he can fill his shelves with. He believes that the "outdoors is an important thing to Moscow. We feel a need to have these books, which allow the public to access it for use and maintenance."

Before leaving the well-lit warm store, Greene informed me of the next outdoor activity that Bookpeople will be hosting. Next Tuesday, Oct. 29 at 7 p.m. outside in Main Street in front of Bookpeople at 512 S. Main Street, is Allen Ginsberg's HOWL 40th anniversary party and reading. There will be live jazz, refreshments and prizes for the best Beat Poet costume. Admission is free.

"A walkin’, after midnight…"

Kevin Murphy

Few people, if any, know about the wonders of midnight walks around the University of Idaho and downtown town.

It’s fun, cheap, and anyone can do it! All you need are: a pair of legs, preferably some clothes, and a night to walk around in. This town is absolutely fascinating at night, maybe even more so than during the day.

Walking around town isn’t exactly an exercise in exercising, but merely something fun to do that isn’t wasteful or damaging. Plus, you may contribute to the town’s economy along the way. No, this isn’t any sort of a new sport, and it certainly isn’t an extreme sport, it’s just walking.

Walking has been around for hundreds of thousands of years, it all began when man became bipedal and sauntered about hunting for food, or maybe he was just walking for the sake of walking. Whatever the reason, walking has not died out in our culture. Nearly everyone does it, and if they don’t it isn’t because they don’t believe in it. It may be one of the few things that brings the world together. There’s even magazine devoted to walking.

Here’s how a midnight town jaunt works: pick a night to go for a walk. (You don’t need a plan, it’s not as if going out on a whim is detrimental to either your health or your personal life.) Put on a pair of shoes and some clothes. You may want to bundle up, it’s beginning to get a wee bit chilly in Moscow. Finally, leave your residence and go for a walk.

A regular walk about town doesn’t follow any path or any guidelines, so feel free to stroll around at your own pace, and in whatever direction pleases you. The best places to hit, though a little overdone, are around the downtown area, Main Street in particular.

The fascinating aspect about Main Street is that if you get lonely, you can always find a friend, or at least someone who’s willing to be your friend if you’ll help them.

Near The Pizza Pipeline is a slew of buildings and trees. Both are good for climbing up, on or around.

cross the street without falling. Second, if you want to hear a live band for free, stand outside the bar until the bouncers tell you to move. And, if you’re hungry, and it’s before 2 a.m., The Pizza Pipeline will be glad to serve you. Finally, there are benches all along the sidewalk, in case you are winded or need a break. Benches are sparse in this town and take a bit of luck to happen upon. Also, Near The Pizza Pipeline is a slew of buildings and trees. Both are good for climbing up, on, or around. However, do not attempt to shimmy up the streetlamp posts, this is illegal. If any authorities find you midway up a lamp post, they will either ask you kindly to stay off the posts, or they may fine you. Don’t find out the hard way.

A few more good aspects about the downtown area: if you happen to be less-than-sober, no worry — almost everyone downtown at night has the same irritation affliction.

A slight stagger in your walk may very well go unnoticed, but be aware of police officers who populate the streets at night, searching for people in your condition. If you do get caught, you are most likely quite tipsy, but at least you were walking and not behind the wheel.

Other areas to walk through, in, or around: The golf course is quite nice — the town is short, and there are plenty of hills, adding to the difficulty of your journey. New Greek Road, which should need no explanation, Wamaret, and/or the Arboretum. Every place in town has its own appeal and should make your evening walk enjoyable.

There are a few things to keep in mind while walking. One, be kind. Don’t damage anything which doesn’t belong to you, it’s only courteous to leave each area just as you found it. Because, hey, what if someone came and kicked off all the sprinkler heads on YOUR golf course?

Two, pick up after yourself — it’s hard to fit those pizza boxes into the public receptacles without a few bends and folds, but only if you’re an idiot. Just be patient and make sure the garbage gets where it belongs.

Three, if you’re inebriated (have fun!), but try not to get caught, especially with your pants down, that would be even worse. Be safe, and make sure you’re not overly obvious or destructive.

Whatever state you’re in when you decide to go for your walk, have fun. Don’t run, it deletes the purpose of walking.
Nothing to do in Moscow?

Shawn Rider
Staff

"There's nothing to do in Moscow."

That's what you hear, anyway, but Mike Beiser, coordinator for the ASU Outdoor Program, would disagree. Beiser has been with the Outdoor Program for the past 13 years and says that functions and classes offered by the program have been continuously growing.

In the last six years alone, the program has grown 20-30 percent. About 5,000- 4,000 people each year participate in their numerous outings and 7,000-4,000 people use the Outdoor Equipment Rental Center annually.

The Outdoor Program organizes classes and outings and also maintains various training facilities and the Rental Center. The classes and outings range from beginner to expert difficulty. Kayaking, rock climbing, scuba diving, backpacking and mountain biking, as well as many other sports, are taught for credit each semester. These classes are supplemented by seminars on various activities that are given throughout each year. Everything from rappelling techniques to how to rent a kayak is covered at these no-credit seminars that are offered for reasonable prices to the general public.

Mike Beiser explains their choice of sports by explaining that these are activities that are more personal growth-oriented and good for groups.

Teamwork is of major importance to the program, which is completely student run. The University of Idaho program is the largest in the state, and the only program comparable to it in the Northwest is Washington State University's. The Outdoor Program is in its 2nd year of operation, which makes it one of the oldest university outdoor programs in the country. Beiser and the program coordinator that functions that are considered lifetime sports — i.e., sports that have more personal growth-oriented than competitive.

In addition to the classes and instructional trips, the program offers more advanced outings that focus more on just accomplishing something than teaching skills. They took an expedition to the top of Mount McKinley and are planning one for Mount Logan in the spring. This expedition is only for advanced mountaineers.

The group also organizes an annual sea kayaking trip in the Sea of Cortez over every Christmas break. By working with larger groups, the trips are made more affordable for students.

The Outdoor Program also runs the Rental Center. The store is economically self-sufficient and makes it possible for students to rent sometimes expensive equipment at a low rate. They rent everything from axes to zero bags. Most of this equipment is high quality and would normally be unobtainable for the average Joe on a shoestring budget.

There will be outdoor equipment swap on Nov. 4, and this is being organized by the Outdoor Program. If you have any questions about any of the programs mentioned here, would like to find a good place to hike or camp, or to get a listing of different activities and services the program offers, stop by the Outdoor Program office or the Rental Center in the SUB basement.

Mid-semester stress strikes on campus

Stress is taking over my life and I love it

The stress has set in. It has taken over my limbs and I have to jolt me into jarring blot of Jello. I can’t eat, can’t sleep, can’t think. Take a look into my psyche and the only words you will see floating around are “term paper, term paper, term paper.”

And I love it.

I am what they call a Type A personality. I am only happy when I’m busy and function best when I have too much to do. If I ever have free time, I hypnotically want it away by feeling guilty that I’m not curing cancer or winning a Pulitzer Prize. When I have enough time to get things done, I slack off and perform at only half my potential, spending the rest of my time watching “Friends” on NBC. But it’s the moments where deadline counts and I have a million other things to do that I adore creating pressure from every pore. I laugh in the face of stress.

“Excellent analysis of the situation,” the professors write on my esays, not knowing that they were created between one and two in the morning on a caffeine high.

I know I’ve reached the point of “Stress Zen” when things start to look funny. I stop talking seriously and start laughing uncontrollably. I begin to do the wild, unimaginable strange dance of spewing bubbles in class and making tapping tones of bodies like police chalk drawings. All of a sudden, it’s OK to mix points with pleasure and wear two different shoes. My diet consists purely of Diet Coke and donut holes mixed with endless iced tea and coffee. Acronyms: SWAG*

A crowns are the base of society, they are taking over my life. One character in my environment has a law class actually asked, “Would the USPS and PWS need to do an NEPA for the NSF if it has potential to be a non-NSD under the MSA administered by the BLM?” I found this extremely funny and laughed so hard tears ran down my face. My professor (the PIC with a Ph.D.) now has more one reason to think I am strange. I think this was a form of human conversation.

At the end of term, students who graduate work primarily for the USA, I should not be surprised by this insanity. After getting my B.S., I could work for the USFS, BLM, TWS, BPA, BLM, CPAU, ENP, NPS, FRP, and many other federal and state agencies.

The club at CPWR fit right in: APS, TWS, RTA, SAC, SMU, and SAF. And they all get funds from ASUI unless they don’t apply then they are SOL. At CPWR in UI, I am taking RRT.

Recreation is measured in RDVs or SPMs (carefully calculated by a SWAG*) by the USFS and other USA agencies. The first SP in the NPS (Yellowstone) gets a lot of RDVs. If you want RRT without people the NWSR developed by NWnRA, the NTS and the USFS offer RRT (and RDVs) well managed under ROS. Remember that the SRT can charge you for rescue if you display SOS, so use common sense or there will be a RN looking over you. Is there a DR in the house?

Did you hear the TMBG is coming to town? I like REM too. I also listen to MPR, PHC, FA and ATC on NPR. My iTunes is also cool, for all it. Did you see JFK? I saw ID4 last weekend, I am glad my Mac is protected from viruses by SAM.

Did you know that the millenium will turn in 2001 A.D. because the calendar goes from 1 B.C. to 1 A.D.? This will mess up the IRS and SS, Steve tear your SIP from the former USSR will fix the problem.

Today I have a plan. I am going to forget all about the satanic dancing letters on Sesame Street, go to CPWR, attract RRTA and PPT. Then go to my TWS meeting, talk about ASUI funding and working with IFG. I should also put in time at PCEI for my internship before doing HW on my PC (I hate AOL). If I get done on time I will watch ER with friends (BYOB). If there is time I may even get lunch at BK and eat in the SUB.*

Guest Commentary

Megan Murphy, SWF

There just isn’t enough time in the world to do all the things I need to do. Every professor needs a brilliant and sanctifying term paper that encompasses the discussion over the entire semester, using class lectures, readings and outside research as sources. Read four novels by Monday. Have it on my desk by Tuesday. Analyze the situation by Wednesday and write an essay, double spaced, due on Thursday.

Is it any wonder my mind is mush? Where is all that college fun I’m supposed to be having? Where are the phony, intellectual group discussions, the late nights in the house with my significant other? What just happened to the last three years of my life? I worked so hard for so many years to get into college, and for what? To work twice as hard as I ever did, with no reassurance that the work I put in will mean anything coming out.

OK, deep breath. What really need to is organize my time and keep track of everything I need to do on my little calendar. I will take every hour of every day and make it productive, somehow. I will do only what is on my list, and complete everything that is there. I will survive. Just keep repeating: Stress is good, stress is good, stress is good, stress is good...

Letters to the Editor

Land owners aren’t evil

While I applaud the organized efforts on the part of the ASUI to express their opposition to the 1 Percent initiative (OP), I am dismayed that the Argonaut and other press have yet to address the issue of why the initiative is on the ballot in the first place.

Sadly, the OP is being reduced to another class warfare issue, us vs. them.

But it is not: property owners are not evil. Chopping down trees with their feet on the necks of the educational system. They are farmers, moms, dads, and others who feel that they are the pockets everyone reaches into whenever a public expenditure is required. Think about it: all citizens are entitled to an education, but not all citizens are required to fund it. Because someone owns property, this automatically means they are “rich” and can afford to bear the brunt of all new capital expenditures?

I am not suggesting that the OP is a good idea; it is far too drastic. But its impetus, its reason for creation, needs to be examined. Other revenue sources, other tax bases need to be examined and pursued. If we are so for educational funding, why would we oppose a VAT for education? Or oppose an increase in the state sales tax to pay for more university grants? Ah, there is the rub: taxes OK as long as someone else is paying.

It is in this light we woke up and realized that the legal term more than just the latest suit of tax cutting — it may be the harbinger of many other such threats. We also abandoned the counter-productive and unfair practice of blaming those with wealth for all of our troubles and trying to soak them at every turn — the current basis for our system. Even in a non-property owner, I am much more willing to pay more sales tax than to lose funding for education. Choosing a more equitable funding system may soon be a necessity, just as an academic argument; the sooner we deal with this the better.

—William Carlson

Writer made mistake in ‘Marvin’s Room’ review

I also enjoyed “Marvin’s Room,” and I appreciated writer Amy-Marie Smith’s favorable review. However, I have to point out an error in the story: It was not “suberco- lonis” that the character Bessie was diagnosed with, as the story said, it was “testesoma” — a very different, and much more serious, illness: a bone marrow cancer.

I know OPAs work under deadline pressure and arestudent with many other commitments, still it is important to avoid such errors, even in arts reviews.

A vote for Tom Train, your candidate for 5th District State Representative, is a vote for integrity, experience, leadership and vision.

Sixteen-year District State Representative Doc Larsen endorsed Tom as his replacement because of Tom’s lifelong commitment to working with, as well as his 34 years as a University of Idaho and the Lewiston-Nez Perce teacher and researcher. Tom also has eight years experiences as Department Chair of the Adult and Continuing Education Program at WSU. He was graduate advisor to more than 60 master’s and doctoral students at WSU including Idaho students. Tom served as Director of the Western Ag Training Project. The University of Idaho was a major collaborator in this project. Tom administered a budget of $5,000,000. Over 360 students were involved in the project. Tom and his colleagues from both WSU and Idaho were successfully involved in writing over $10,000,000 in grants. Tom also serves on University of Idaho committees. Tom Train will be a strong representative from District Five for public and higher education. Please vote for Tom Train, District 5 State Representative, November 5th.

These secessionists, and their paper, have their own revolutionary martyrs: the Weaver family, Ted Kaczynski, David Koresh, and their more reactionary cousins in Quebec, Rwanda and Bosnia. These people, like our own North Idaho revolutionaries, share the understandable desire to live life as they please, paying heed to no one. But these so-called martyrs have something these so-called revolutionaries will never have: the courage to pay the price for their ideals of freedom. I, for one, am glad none are little more than armchair patriots.

I’ve lived in southern Idaho most of my life, but have spent two and a half years in North Idaho so I know what it’s like on each end of Highway 95. I think it makes perfect sense that residents of North Idaho feel more of a kinship with the nuts, reactionaries, freaks and downright weirdos of eastern Washington than they do with the nuts, freaks and downright weirdos of the parent state. Geography and politics make that so. I know I’d feel more comfortable with Mr. “National Militia.”

began “heritage” group. That’s all it’ll take for Proposition Two to pass. Some thought. Of course, it would be easier to go the other way. To vote for Proposition Two down will be to give way to irrational fear that imposes basic sensible rules, already in place for other hunters, will somehow be taking away sacred rights. I’m optimistic, though, I believe a little thought beats a lot of fear and distortion every time. So think it over, face reality, and vote on Nov. 5. I’m sure you’ll do the right thing. A yes vote on Proposition Two is the right thing to make the great hunting in Idaho even better. And, oh yeah, it’ll make things a bit better for our bears, too.

Sherwood in Blackfoot then I would wish Bo “Kidnapper King” Critt in Kamiah. Showing how Mr. Sherwood dis- banded his militia because it attracted too many non-s to the cause makes southern Idaho infinitely more attractive. To each his own, I suppose.

Eastern Washington, at least, will welcome year with open arms. Almost all large Republicans and even most of the local Democrats seem to have the same sc rawly ideals embod- ied by a certain Washington- based bunch which, in its latest television commercial blitz, seems to think those same Californication banker-cum- bandits are hell-bent for sages brush to drain every last cent of the state and cut it back to California in order to buy themselves at least a dozen more “fot bubbles,” cassius, as another local hero, Archie Bunker, put it so good. Well, good thing the Ellensburg Grandma Militia was there to chase them out of Columbia — er, Washington, or was that North Idaho?

Refresh my memory. Where, exactly, are we?

Craig vital element in Vandals' team chemistry

Kindra Meyer

Sophomore Beth Craig has emerged as one of the leading forces for the University of Idaho's volleyball team.

Standing at 6-1, Craig, who played for the Vandals off the deadly approach and powerful snap-downs, has hit for double-figure kills, including a 17-kill match last Saturday. During that stretch she hit for a percentage of .341.

As a freshman, Craig had some big shoes to fill starting in the absence of All-American Mindy Rice. She took on her role with intensity and proved herself, averaging 3.4 kills per game.

Craig was set on Idaho after her second visit to the school, enjoying the campus, community, and solid volleyball program, but most of all how close the team was. The move form her small hometown of Milpitas, Calif., wasn't something hard for her, especially at a freshman. Luckily, the good homecourt advantage of friends was quickly replaced by a second family — the Vandals.

Craig was first drawn to the sport of volleyball through participating friends. Surprisingly enough, her first year playing was not well when she was a freshman at high school. As soon as she started playing, she knew she wanted to do it full time. It wasn't long before coaches noticed her potential, moving her up to the varsity squad in the middle of that first year. Adjusting from middle blocking in high school to outside hitting was a slight obstacle for Craig — one that she quickly overcame.

"It was difficult because there is a difference, but I like the role that it gives me. It's not as physically demanding as middle blocking. You don't get the perfect set of blocks all the time, you have to adjust," Craig said.

This season Craig has exploded, performing with power and grace. She ranks third in the team in kills at 3.46 per game behind Jessica Moore's 3.59 and Jeri Ryman's 3.72. She's also second in aces with 20 this season and third in block solos with six. But perhaps the greatest feat has been overcoming a defensive struggle with the team's opening season, to now be second on the team in kills.

"Last year I didn't play any defense and looking into this season I knew I would be playing all defense. But when they put me in, point out where I needed to do. I think that I just took a defensive role," Craig said.

During games where Craig will block a pass or two in or near a hitter, Ryman will leave her in, unlike other teammates who would otherwise sub for her. One attribute Craig prides herself in is her ability to separate hits on the floor. Ryman, said, "I think her input was very important to me. I was a bit confused on where I needed to do. I think that I just took a defensive role."
Einspahr adjusting to new setting

Mark Vanderwall

For the past couple of months, Carolyn Einspahr has felt very different for one University of Idaho freshman. It has meant actually going to class. No, she didn’t skip out on school, but rather was home schooled and is getting one of her first tastes of the classroom. One thing she was already accustomed to when she arrived was swinging clubs and playing competitive golf. Witness Einspahr came to UI with big aspirations to play golf. She also came without a lot of classroom experience. Einspahr hails from Burbank, Wash., where she was taught by her parents during the day and honed her golf game whenever the chance allowed. Now she actually has to be in a classroom for a certain amount of time, but she has adjusted well.

"Taking school notes and sitting in class were the biggest adjustments for me," said Einspahr. "Now that I am used to it, it is really pretty easy."

Idaho was not the first place Einspahr wanted to go, nor did she know where Moscow was when she received her letter of interest from the university, but what she did know was she wanted to go to college on a golf scholarship. Idaho showed the most interest in Einspahr, but more importantly, filled the necessary paperwork for a home schooled is attending college and participate under NCAA regulations.

"I had no idea where Moscow was when I received the letter," said Einspahr. "They (UI) did awesome things to get me here, with all the paperwork they had to file for me to play golf.

Einspahr still took the SAT or ACT to be eligible to attend Idaho, but copies of her school books and such had to be presented to UI and the NCAA before she arrived. After discovering where Moscow was, and arriving on campus, Einspahr jelled nicely with the team.

"We have very good team chemistry," said Einspahr. "None of us are playing to our potential right now, but come spring we should be a good golf team."

While attending home school, Einspahr was allowed to play golf on the Pasco, Wash., high school team. Pasco is close to Burbank, but in a different school district. Burbank didn’t have a golf team, so Einspahr traveled to Pasco to play. Not being from the same school district, Einspahr’s points were not counted toward the team total, which only allowed her to earn the medals (individual) honors at a tournament.

"I’ve never played for a spot on a team before I got here," said Einspahr. "I have always treated golf as an individual sport. Now that you have your team to fall back on if you have a bad round, it takes a lot of the pressure off of you as an individual."

Being a team player is not a new concept for Einspahr, as she has taken part in the Explorer Program for the past five years. In the Explorer Program, Einspahr travels with the police officers that are on duty, and takes part in nearly every aspect of the arrest, with the exception that she doesn’t get to carry a gun. Through this experience, Einspahr has narrowed down a career to two choices: criminal justice or optometry (one guess you have to be able to see to be a cop).

"I think I will pursue a career in optometry rather than criminal justice, for the simple fact I do not have the criminal justice part at the same time through the reserves," said Einspahr.

When Einspahr takes to the course, it is like she has a playing partner at all times. She has found someone to be there when her game is bad, or if she is shooting light rounds.

"God is my guide," said Einspahr. "It is awesome for me to know that he is my creator, but also my personal friend."

Showing a strong religious background, Einspahr takes that to every aspect of life, not to mention the course. Being home schooled, Einspahr has been able to concentrate on strengthening both her golf game and her religious upbringing. Einspahr doesn’t feel she had it any better than anyone else, just because she was home schooled, but rather made better use of her time.

"I went to public school my senior year for two classes in Pasco, and I realized something while I was there," said Einspahr. "They want a lot of time in public schools doing nothing but watching movies or something. I was able to get my studies done, then use that extra time in variety of ways."

Since arriving on campus, Einspahr has only had the best individual score in two out of the three Vandal tournaments. As her first collegiate golf tournament, it would have been easy for this medium-built powerhouse of energy to get down on herself, but there was no way this was going to happen, not with her upbringing.

"Going into that tournament at Brigham Young University, Einspahr had never played golf on a team. It had always been individual. When arriving in Salt Lake City, the snow in the mountains told a story, and not a pleasant one if you had playing golf in mind."

Jimmy and Jerry go separate ways, meet again

Damon Barkdull

A s the world turns, so does the Jimmy vs. Jerry soap opera.

When the Dallas Cowboys collapse with the Miami Dolphins this Saturday in Joe Robbie stadium, football game between two 4-3 teams will be played.

Big deal, right? I mean, there are better teams and better matchups on this weekend. True. However, regardless of who wins the Cowboys-Dolphins battle, you can be sure that this late October game will be a wrestling match of egos and arrogant opinions.

On one side, you have a wealthy owner who believes he could one day own the world. He spent behind the back of the NFL last season, signing a big deal with Nike to ensure the signing of Deion Sanders. He is the J.R. Ewing of real life.

He hired a legend in Tom Landry and hired a rookie NFL coach in Jimmy Johnson. Together they won two back-to-back Super Bowls. They were considered one of the best sport franchises ever put together.

However, this jolly, jelly-belly rosé-cheeked guy they call Jimmy, was in a sense, getting all the credit. It was Jerry’s money and Jimmy’s mastermind which won the two Super Bowls — so one person could take credit.

Although, in a game filled with too many egos and too few ordinary, down-to-earth jocks, something would have to give. Not even the sticky hair spray which held Jerry’s toupee together could keep the Cowboy management united. Jerry told people that any coach would’ve won the Big Game with the talent of the Cowboys. Jimmy disagreed.

And so the two went on a love/hate relationship and then love birds departed.

Jerry decided to hire a harsh good old boy. Barry Switzer won many games at Oklahoma though he divided the waters when several of his players decided to act like convicts. Busted.

Jimmy, on the other hand, sported a cheery smile on FOX netwow’s weekday football games. His anecdotes were terrible and his demeanor was worse. Coaching was his forte and he doing the FOX gig strangled his credibility.

The muddling beginning. Egos again clash.

Cought in the middle was a Dallas Cowboys squad who carried a lot of pride for their new coaching, while still wanting to stay together as a winning unit in big D.

Time has since passed. The Cowboys are a Super Bowl ring richer. Don Shula is helping his son Dave cry his way through the Cincinnati unemployment line. And Jimmy is back in southern Florida, trying to lead the fish to the promise land of Super Bowl society.

Moreover, Jimmy faces his Texas snobishness this weekend.

This week, Jimmy has told the press that this just is another game — no big deal. Likewise, Jerry is saying the same thing. In fact, the two former best friends are eliminating each other more so that they can find an average bashing. Who? Not really when you consider the type of comments that motivate a team.

So do Jimmy and Jerry care about this game? You bet your ass they do. Jimmy wants nothing more than to demolish his old team and make his old boys eat his ignorant comments. Jerry wishes to prove that Shula’s concoction of the future and dreams of being considered the greatest business man that ever lived.

No really important. More people are interested in seeing the game itself. People are sick of controversies and real life soap operas — shame to O.J., shame to the CIA, shame to Jimmy and Jerry for ruining the game of football.

So here goes, a game score rather than a dramatic play. The Cowboys come out fired up. The Dolphins are fired up too. The Dallas run game is virtually shut down, however, Michael and K-Mart come up big with 100+ games.

Dallas 28, Miami 14.
Gardner jelling nicely into Vandal secondary

Nate Petersen

For defensive back Bryson Gardner, his first start against Wyoming will probably not be his most memorable.

"I was really excited to play and I got beat the first play," said Gardner. "I had to come back and respond from that and just keep on playing. I was really tense and you've gotta relax, so I got beat deep."

Gardner has relaunched since then and now instead of giving up the big plays he has been making them. Last Saturday he was extremely efficient vs. the Nevada Wolf Pack. Gardner and the rest of the Vandal secondary proved a lot on Saturday vs. the visiting Wolf Pack.

"We went out there and showed everybody that we could play," said Gardner. "That was a great game. A lot of people didn't think the defensive backs could hold up with the number one offense in the nation."

Gardner, a free safety, has helped bring a resurgent to a Vandal secondary that has been criticized in the past few weeks.

"A lot of people were questioning us," said Gardner. "They saw we had a good defensive line and linebackers, but they didn't think much of our secondary. In that game we held the number one offense in the nation and showed them that we have a true secondary here at Idaho."

After relaunching his first year, Gardner worked his way up through the depth chart and into the starting spots.

"I just worked on the scout team like everybody else," said Gardner. "I worked hard and I had a pretty good spring. I did some good things, and got the starting job for the fall."

Playing free safety demands a lot out of an individual. You must be a good athlete and have the ability to make the play. The responsibilities are some of the most important on the team.

"It's tough, you miss a tackle and it's a touchdown," said Gardner. Gardner believes that they have a well-rounded secondary to compete in the high passing and high scoring Big West.

"I think we are good in man and zone," said Gardner. "We do good things in man, and we do good things in zone. It's just a matter of who we are playing and what they are running."

Besides making improvements on their coverages, Gardner and the rest of the Vandal defense have been making strides in improving the poor turnover ratio that has plagued the Vandals this year.

"We are starting to get the turnovers," said Gardner. "Coaches have been stressing turnovers the last few weeks and against Nevada and it paid off."

Now the Vandals and Gardner face another challenge in the Utah State Aggies. The Vandals will be traveling to Logan, Utah, for a game tomorrow that will most likely decide the winner of the Big West Conference.

"We hold our own destiny," said Gardner. "We win this game and we are in the driver's seat for the championship."

Like the Nevada game, the Vandal-Aggie matchup will be a first-fight from beginning to end. Both teams are comprised of great offensive players and defensive players. It will take the full combined effort of Gardner and the Vandals to pull off the win.
