UI professors lagging in pay

Russel Wright

University of Idaho full professors are paid much less than their counterparts at other institutions, according to a study released by a local branch of the American Federation of Teachers.

There are a total of four faculty positions in the UI system: instructor, assistant professor, associate professor and professor. Of the four positions, professors are by far the furthest behind the national average—7.2 percent less according to the figures provided by AFT.

Assistant professors fair a little better—they are only six percent behind the national average. Instructors are the most fairly compensated of the group, falling just 2.3 percent below national figures.

Nicholas Gier, AFT vice-president, has a term for this problem—salary compression. Salary compression, according to Gier, began when UI officials began attempting to bring the university up to national averages in the pay scale by hiring new faculty for more钱.

The attempt to fix one problem, however, only led to another—those who have been with the university for long periods of time have largely been left out of the attempt to equalize pay. As a result, their salaries—as shown by the differences between full professors and the rest of the faculty—lag further behind than those of newer arrivals at UI.

"I would like to see the administration address this. It is demoralizing for full professors," said Gier.

One reason UI profs have fallen behind in pay is due to a state law prohibiting salary negotiations.

"It is fairly common to see low pay in states where unions are not allowed to bargain," said Gier. AFT, barred from acting as a representative for faculty in bargaining for salaries, has instead been active on campuses all over Idaho attempting to arbitrate discrepancies between faculty members and universities. Out of approximately 700 faculty on UI's campuses, only 70 have membership in AFT. UI's chapter is the largest in the state.

Additionally, UI's low pay is due to its location in the small town of Moscow, Idaho, rather than the larger urban centers.

"Currently, salary raises given are based on living costs and not the cost-of-living rates," said Gier. However, according to UI's Board of Regents, that is changing.

New senator to fill ASUI vacancy

Adam Gardels

The ASUI has added another senator to fill the void left by Kristin Bonnet's resignation. Senator Geoff Carey is looking forward to his service at the ASUI. "I like it a lot. I'm learning right now how things work around here. You can do a lot of different things," he said about his experience as a senator so far.

Carey—a junior in Computer Engineering who hails from Boise—said he will be serving on the Rules and Regulations Committee and is on the Communication Board.

Geoff said one of his concerns is campus safety.

"The overall goal is to make UI a better place to learn at and go to school," he said.

Geoff was interviewed by President Marble who then nominated Geoff for the vacant senatorial position based on his resume and the interview. The ASUI senate agreed on Carey's candidacy, granting him a seat on the senate in a senate meeting held Oct. 5.

Tourism boosts service industry

Shelley Dupp

Editor's note: This article is the second of a three-part series on the tourism industry in Idaho.

The service and retail industry—including jobs in the hotel and lodging industry and in the restaurant business—has seen a significant increase due to the tourism boom in northern Idaho. These relatively low-paying jobs have been replaced by blue collar jobs—such as logging and mining—as Idaho finds itself moving toward service/retail oriented jobs due to a boom in tourism.

According to Doug Tweedy, area labor market analyst for the Idaho Department of Employment, the five counties in central Idaho have also seen a decrease in blue collar jobs such as logging. The five counties include Latah, Clearwater, Idaho and Nez Perce.

"Since 1980, we have lost half of our logging jobs," Tweedy said. The logging industry has seen a loss of approximately 2,400 jobs in this area. "During that period, we gained about 4,500 jobs in the service and retail industry," he said. For every job lost in logging, the counties have gained more than two jobs in the service/retail sector. Even though service/retail jobs pay their employees half of what those in the logging industry receive, the area has not seen a decrease in total payroll, Tweedy said.

Additionally, it is much easier to find a job in the service sector than in logging. A person who becomes unemployed in the logging industry may face unemployment for up to six months, while a person employed in the service/retail industry remains unemployed for 30 days on average. And because jobs in the service/retail industry share many of the same job skills, it is easier for a worker to switch jobs within the industry than it is for forestry-product workers.

According to Janell Feyer, researcher and analyst for the Idaho Department of Commerce, Idaho has seen a significant increase in service/retail jobs as tourism has increased over the years. In 1992, the hotel and lodging industry's average of total jobs totaled 6,891 employees. In 1993, it increased to an average total of 7,382 workers employed and as of August 1994, the industry averaged about 7,675 total people employed.

The mining industry, having been severely crippled when the price of silver plummeted in the early '80's, saw a loss of 779 jobs from 1980 to 1990—a change of 31.8 percent. The mining industry again saw a decrease in employment from 1992 to 1993. In 1993, 2,603 people were employed in the mining industry, having been severely crippled when the price of silver plummeted in the early '80's, saw a loss of 779 jobs from 1980 to 1990—a change of 31.8 percent. Bolivians exchange ideas, culture during UI visit

Shannon Paterson

Twenty-Five Bolivians visited the University of Idaho campus for a special course on agricultural and environmental protection for the past month—but they didn't take home just classroom knowledge with them. Their first trip outside of Bolivia changed their entire perspective of life in the United States.

"In Bolivia, the U.S. is known as a big monster that wants to dominate the world," said Zacharias Yura through a translator. Yura is president of an agricultural agency in his hometown of La Paz, "But the people are very nice, and I will leave with very good memories of this place."

Virginia Vera de Montevilla, director of the same agency for whom Yura works, was impressed with UI students. "It's encouraging to know that there are bright, young people who will solve the world's problems," she said.

The diverse group—meeting each other minutes before boarding a plane for the United States—came to UI to learn techniques that will help them make changes in their environmentally damaged communities back home, according to Sam Ham, the program's coordinator.

"They're here specifically to learn how they can communicate with their fellow villages on how to solve problems in their communities," he said. "That's a tall order and the main underpinning of the whole program." The privilege of hosting the program was given to UI after a competition among all UI universities around the country. Each university was invited to submit a proposal for the course which is sponsored by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

Aside from our language ability (at UI), I feel we are the best equipped when it comes to world-wide education," Ham said.

Most of the Bolivians are excellent speakers, according to UI students, but they have learned through the program to use exhibits, brochures, video work and visual aids to enhance their speaking styles. Posters with Spanish phrases and colorful drawings lined the walls of Shoup Hall during their final presentations when they outlined specific plans for environmental education.

Montevilla suggested each community hire an agricultural expert and two community leaders to oversee agricultural development.

Other specifics in her report included taking advantage of the exponential effect of contacting several community leaders, having a central meeting place where representatives can gather to discuss progress and raising funds for the purchase of video equipment.

Ham was impressed with Montevilla's insights. "That's really good recognition on her part," said Ham.

Ham said the Bolivians want to take some kind of community entity to help them carry out their plans.

"They realize that going back home will be like working in a vacuum, that they can accomplish far more as a group," said Ham. "They really have a plan to improve—lives which is what it all is about."

Ham and his colleagues have been preparing their Bolivian students with a "reentry program" which will help them deal with the reactions of fellow townpeople.

"It's important to be prepared for the fact that people won't be lined up at their door begging to hear their story," Ham said. "But I think they have a good handle on the reality they're going to face. Their world view is greatly expanded.

Ham is very satisfied with the amount of learning that has taken place among the UI students. "We have all ranges here—from third grade level to university graduates. Imagine trying to teach one topic to all those different ability levels. But in the end, they end up teaching each other. It really makes me feel like what I'm doing is worthwhile when I sit back and hear what they've done with the information I've given them. They have such huge hopes and dreams," said Ham.

Real and urban communities in Bolivia have watched their environment become increasingly polluted and worn out. Soil is oversaturated, water sources are contaminated and waste and the large amount of farm animals pose a serious health risk. The country is relying less and less on the cocoa plant—which can be used to produce not only cocoa but also a number of other products. Bolivia sees this period as a great change for his country.

"Things used to be like a big family unit," he said. "Now it's become so big and we can't sustain it. We can go off from a coca to a no-coca economy."

"They have to develop a new way of thinking about themselves and what the economic unit is," added Ham.

A second addition to changes in the Bolivian environment and economy, women's roles are changing.

BRA BOOSTS PALOUSE

The Bon Marche has given about 90 women in the Palouse area an "uplifting experience."

The Wondeatha arrived in Moscow Friday and was on sale for $26. According to Bon employee Kelly Trager-Millham, the store sold half of its 188 bra stock over the weekend and is constantly bombarded with inquiries about the new apparel. The Seattle store sold 80 percent of their Wonderbras the first day it arrived. The only reason Moscow has not sold more of the Wonderbras is because the popular sizes have already sold out—losing popular sizes are all that remain.

As far as Intimate Apparel Manager Krisel Kowatch knows, the Bon Marche is the only store in Moscow to carry the Wonderbra. The bra has been all the rage in Europe and is the number one selling bra in Britain.

Superwall Kate Moss, in the January issue of Vanity Fair magazine, said of the Wonderbras, "They are so brilliant, I mean, even I can get cleavage with them."

Moscow area consumers have been making special trips to the Bon Marche just to try on the bra. According to Trager-Millham, nearly every female employee of the Bon has tried it on as well.

Lance seeks attorney general seat in November

Zach Craig-Works
Staff

A slate of candidates is running for attorney general. He is currently serving in the Idaho House as a representative from District 14. Lance received his Bachelor's degree from South Dakota State University and was commissioned in the U.S. Army in 1971. Lance went on to law school at the University of Toledo and later to the University of Virginia in the Judge Advocate General's Division.

Lance served in the Army in the Judge Advocate General's Corps from 1974 until 1978 and attained the rank of Captain. He has had a regular practice in Meridian, Idaho.

In the House, he has served on the State Affairs committee, the Judiciary rules and Administration Committee, the Ways and Means Committee and as Majorca Caucus Chairman.

Lance has been active in the American Legion, the Meridian Chamber of Commerce, Rotary, Elks Club, the National Rifle Association, Kiwanis Club and is a member of ten Bar Associations.

Argonaut: In your platform statement you said that one of your priorities is to secure Idaho's water rights currently serving in the Idaho do that?

Lance: In the Snake River Basin adjudication, between the federal government and Native American tribes, there are 7,129 claims. It is the responsibility of the attorney general to defend against those claims and evaluate each claim to make sure it is based upon a claim of right. The quantity of water claimed needs to be evaluated and under appropriate circumstances, litigated.

The attorney general's office has a responsibility to stand up to the agencies of the federal government who, as an example, drew down Dworshak Reservoir, Cascade Reservoir, and now is drawing down the Palisades Reservoir and the Folsom Reservoir. Under the dubious rubric of a "fish-flush," Idaho is being asked to sacrifice its lifeblood, its water, in the absence of any science to indicate that this flush fish is going to assist the salmon in their travel downstream. The attorney general's responsibility is to seek injunctive relief to prevent the federal agency from taking Idaho's water.

Argonaut: Is Idaho losing its sovereign rights to control its natural resources?

Lance: I don't know if we're losing our sovereign rights, but the federal government is of the opinion that we have very few or is ignoring those we do have.

When it comes to issues like management of our timber or water, it seems the federal government is acting autocratically— as if Idaho has no sovereign rights.

Argonaut: Do you see this as being a state's rights issue?

Lance: As part of a larger issue, yes. "State's rights" is certainly one of the ways to term it, but it relates to the erosion of the federal government—statements (such as that made by) the Secretary of the Interior Babbitt in Wyoming last week indicating the West has too many dams. He would like to be the first Secretary of the Interior to remove dams. I'm not sure if he's talking about any Idaho dam in particular, but that shows a sign of irresponsibility, a lack of understanding, and a certain arrogance by agencies in the federal government.

Argonaut: Do you think Idaho should continue to battle the importation of nuclear wastes for storage at the Idaho National Engineering Laboratory?

Lance: Idaho is entitled to the injunctive relief to prevent the federal agency from taking Idaho's waste. Idaho has the right to refuse any additional nuclear waste generated as a result of power plants in other states.

I believe Governor Andrus accepted a portion of waste under the theory it should be absorbed by Idaho as part of the cost of national defense.

Under no circumstance would I permit the federal government to require us to accept nuclear waste we do not have an obligation to accept.

Argonaut: Does the federal government have the power to require the state of Idaho to take nuclear waste?

Lance: They are of that opinion.

Argonaut: Will you fight any actions of this nature by the federal government?

Lance: Any time the federal government tries to do or states what it perceives to be its right over the rights of Idaho, it's the obligation of the legislature, the governor and the attorney general to decide whether or not that should be challenged.

Whenever the federal government wishes to import nuclear waste without the permission of Idaho, then there is a cause for action, and we ought to resist it.

Argonaut: Do you think Idaho has a problem with juvenile crime?

Lance: Clearly we do. In the last several years, there has been no leadership in the area of juvenile justice. As a consequence, we have a juvenile justice that has collapsed. Part of the responsibility for that collapse is the Department of Health and Welfare, which has administered the system for the last several years.

We need to develop a system that stands alone—not under the Department of Health and Welfare—and develop systems of detention other than what we have now. The system we have now provides very few options when it comes to detention.

Most of the counties are at capacity in terms of their juvenile detention facilities. Health and Welfare is now talking about exporting juveniles to other states for purposes of detention. That's going to be time consuming as well as costly. We need to develop our own system in means of detention and alternatives for the juvenile justice system.

I am endorsed by 70 out of 105 legislators—about 66 percent of the legislature. That endorsement is a result of working with me for the last two years as a legislator. I have their confidence.

The attorney general's responsibility is to provide leadership to the legislature in terms of developing a juvenile justice system and present it to the legislature for appropriate statutory changes.

The problem needs leadership. My opponent does not have that experience. He has the endorsement nor the support of the majority of the legislators. I do, and I can get the job done.

Argonaut: What is your opinion of boot camp style rehabilitation and their effectiveness?

Lance: There are two types of boot camps, one of which is a motivational boot camp. The other type of boot camp system is noted with barbed wire around it which serves as basically a holding pen for young adults.

Boot camps can be very effective, and I would suggest we need three: one in the panhandle area, one in the southwest and one in the east. We (also) need a separation division under the Department of Corrections for young adults sentenced to long periods of imprisonment.

The boot camp system can be a good one. Self-motivation has proven to be very effective in our Cottonwood program, and we ought to have it in our juvenile justice. I just said we're going to take this away from Health and Welfare. That's true, but see LANCE PAGE 6

Touring in August

BY TIM PHILP

The economy in the United States appears to have changed dramatically since the early 1990s, when the unemployment rate was around 7 percent. However, in recent years, the rate has fallen below 5 percent, and many economists are predicting that it will continue to decline in the near future. This is good news for workers, as it means more jobs are available and wages are likely to rise. The overall economy has also improved, with growth in the gross domestic product and a decline in inflation.

However, there are still some concerns about the economy. The labor force participation rate has fallen, and this could be a sign of a skills shortage. In addition, the productivity growth has slowed, which could be a sign of a slowdown in economic growth.

In conclusion, the economy is doing well, but there are still some concerns that need to be addressed. However, many economists are optimistic about the future and believe that the economy will continue to grow in the coming years.

Lance: Well, clearly I'm not in a habit, at an attorney, of criticizing the Supreme Court,'and I will not do that here. The ramifications of the Matthew's case really concern me. I will continue to review it. I will speak to other prosecutors, I will talk to expert officials and ascertain if any remedial action would be necessary from a legislative perspec- tive.

Unfortunately, it would appear the issue of tribal sovereignty has once again heated up in terms of the Clearwater River and the Nez Pierce claim of tribal sovereignty when it comes to fishing for steel- head. This may be part of a larger and more complex problem. Argonaut: What would you do to improve or enforce domestic vio- lence laws in Idaho as attorney general? Lance: Leadership is the key. In the last four years, we have had pieces of legislation that have come to no piece of work in an effort to patch together some of the domes- tic violence laws we have. Domestic violence is (reaching) epidemic proportions. It needs to be addressed in a comprehensive manner. In the past, we have ear- marked money for helping victims. I'm not against helping victims, but one slicked has been dedicated to establishing an evaluation sys- tem. An individual convicted of domestic battery needs to be evalu- ated and qualified counselors prior to being sentenced so the judge can review sentencing alternatives. We don't presently have that (because) there has been no fund- ing for it—I do need to do that. The funding is only to estab- lish a system throughout Idaho. It's not to pay for the batterer's evalua- tion or counseling. It's merely to establish and to qualify counselors that are capable of conducting evaluations.

Argonaut: What is your opinion of the federal government's handling of Randy Weaver case in Boise last year? Lance: I have some real concerns. The report requested by Senator Craig has not been released by the Clinton administration. I would like to review that report in order to formulate an opinion as to the pos- sibility of some of the actions und- taken by the federal agents that were involved. I'm not sure executing a young boy, who apparently was innocence of any crimes, and a lady who hap- pened to be present on the scene was really worth the risk or the case when the individual could have been apprehended in a more rea- sonable manner.

There have been a series of applica- tions of excessive force in my opinion. We had the same situation in Waco when David Koresh could have been apprehended for the offense without placing innocent individuals at risk. I question their judgment.

I am a former Army officer. I've been trained in the application of force, but I also know when not to use it. Maybe individuals chose to apply more force than was necessary. Rules of engagement should have been spelled out early on that would have prevented the tragic death of not only the officer, but Mrs. Weaver and the Weaver child. Argonaut: Would you see this again, as another federal mishan- dling of a local issue? Lance: We don't have any questions about saying it was mishandled. There are questions that need to be discussed and debated. There have been a series of events where either the FBI, Justice Department, BATF or some other agency of government seem to be exceeding what I perceive to be their mission and their authority.

Military holds higher standard for gays

In a dynamic world, change is inevitable; static systems tend to fail in any framework. However, that doesn't stop some agencies from trying to maintain the status quo at all costs. One example is the Pentagon, which has reluctantly modified their "don't ask, don't tell" policy on homosexuals in the military.

In 1992, Keith Meinhold was discharged following his name being attached to his homosexuality. He promptly sued, which resulted in a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court earlier this year, stating that homosexuals can not be forcibly discharged simply for coming out of the closet. However, under the "don't ask, don't tell" policy, discharge remains a possibility unless the gay serviceperson can prove they will remain celibate during their term of service.

How interesting. Homosexuals are now able to serve, but only if they are forced to act as heterosexuals. A curious policy is not unreasonable, it bogs down for more litigation on behalf of homosexuals.

The military traditionally has argued that homosexuals make inferior soldiers, ostensibly because of the undermining of morale. Perhaps the policy is not unreasonable, but it bogs down for any arguments more sound than those feeble attempts.

Outdated policies have caused more bureaucratic gridlock in the Pentagon than any other source. If the Pentagon wants to avoid legal entanglements, a new policy, one that is open-minded and fair in considering the role of homosexuals in the military, is most befitting. Otherwise, the Pentagon can look forward to spending taxpayer dollars defending themselves from lawsuits. The Pentagon does not always have models of serving their country, only to be cheated of their careers and victimized by a institution they joined out of patriotism and a sense of pride.

God bless America.

B ring broke has given me an appreciation for what money can do. Since I'm a poor, no cash, suddenly anything I can feel like somehow my life isn't complete unless I own it. I wonder how my life would be changed if I had, say, a million dollar house, make that a billion, that way it would be hard to blow the whole wad away simultaneously.

Adventures have done a good job making the public feel like mutants if they don't have this car or that pair of shoes. We could never understand the mysteries of the universe unless we get Time-Life books. We are subjected to info-mercials that have some blood telling us how great this food dehydrator is. We can make beef jerky at home for $29.95!

For a small investment of two or three thousand dollars, plus a month...you too can cruise the internet. Explore newsgroups such as an online hamster dance tape gasp. Send a personal ad to millions of people. Meet the man or woman of your dreams "high" or chat with international computer geeks. Wow.

TV preachers tell us we can buy salvation if we just send a little each month. For an extra fifteen dollars, we get a mug too. We can teach our kids with Hooked on Phonics. All we have to do is sit down with our kids and they won't be laughed at for being "illiterate." We don't need to pay teachers anymore— that means more cash for trash. If someone doesn't buy a new body, a good credit line is all we need. Silicon, steel, an elastic and a oven we do it for a price. But wait, now there is the Wonderbra. Surgery be damned! I can have cleavage for 30 bucks. Cool.

I really don't even need to have a great body because if I wear sneakers that cost over $100, it will automatically be an athlete. I will be able to do jumps-shots, run a mile and the like. If I'm feeling confused, I can talk to a psychic for $19.9 a minute. She can tell me about my love life, career and future. This is how we all know that whatever psychics say those 900 lines is true and we can't change it.

If I'm feeling lonely, how about a love letter in scented wax? For $25.00 I can write anything about that kind of wax, I'm sure I have been doing for free for years anywhere.

Professors, ASUI employees, students get the shaft

University of Idaho professors aren’t United Teachers. At least that’s the impression I got when I read a recent salary report by the American Federation of Teachers. UI unit professors get paid about $13,460 less than the national average. That measly difference can buy a lot, including books.

In the situation of low wages there’s a few things we should consider: 1) The UI President deserves to be paid $130,000, 2) paying professors $13,000 less than they’re worth costs more, and 3) that UI students aren’t worth anything either.

UI President Elizabeth Zierow works for the University of Idaho. She never leaves campus. When she goes home, she goes to a home on campus. The position demands total thought, total dedication. She can’t take a break from UI. This stone warrnrs her salary. The distinction is this, the job requires a higher level of pay and that the pay requires a higher level of output.

A professor also puts forth a part of his life, when it comes to teaching students—at least a good one. When a professor doesn’t get paid what he’s worth, a certain amount of resentment builds up and is bad for morale. Why should we go the extra mile for the students? If we don’t appreciate him when he sees his check, this notion is reinforced.

UI professors get four-fifths of the pay their colleagues make and inevitably start putting forth four-fifths of the effort. Consequently, students get only four-fifths of what they deserve.

My last point is that students aren’t worth anything either—they trickle down economics. Last week I picked up a copy of the Associated Students of the University of Idaho budget. It’s about as thick as the head of President John Marble could Paigon on the platform of a billion or woman of the world. Though much of this commendable work, the million-dollar budget was halved, though in some ways at the cost of the students.

One ASUI Senator once told me that ASUI positions, particularly the Senate positions, were paid poorly because, "We don’t want anybody doing them only for the money."

The statement is true, one comes from a background where you get paid to do your job well. I worked for a few summers for a luggage outfit. The owner paid his employees some of the best wages in the Northwest, but there was a catch—he demanded more out of his employees. He expected 12 hour days (sometimes 14), and Saturday work that occasional- ly spilled over into Sundays if a job needed to be done. He had developed a symbiotic relationship. When an extra mile was needed, the workers ran for it. His company was super-successful.

What can you expect from someone whose getting paid pennies? Our perception, though, is that save some money and keep the jobs. If those who really want to do the job—a noble thought, but just as flawed as socialism. Even the best workers can’t help but think about low pay when they hear bits all neat the paycheck. The university doesn’t need this misdirection of thought.

What happens is the student body pays the university for an inflated price. Interns at investing in a say, a quality bicycle, buy the cheapest one possible and ask the riders to publicized hard. The riders eventually spend more time repairing brakes than actually going anywhere.

I have a different vision, though. I would like to see every ASUI employee paid high salaries. I would like to see students waiting in line to pick up applications for the ASUI employment, ready to offer their talents in return for a great job.

I’d like to see more students be able to afford to work for their fellow students. I’d like to see how many of those who have other incomes can accept a job that requires such much work. I’d like to see delivery pigs, which pays much better—a real shame. I’d like to see how many available applicants dwindles.

One of the best arguments ASUI do the university administration can’t—raise their salaries, make the product. ASUI Senators currently make $200 a semester. Is that the best they can put in, that’s pathetic. I’d like to see the ASUI Senate treat this situation as an emergency and start battling it by raising their own pay.

And then start earning it.
Columnist short on logic, consistency

In the Oct. 11 edition, you pub-ished an editorial entitled "Calling all male feminists!" by Jennifer Swift. I am writing this letter in response. The editorial is strong on emo-tivity and comes across snappy, but is filled with gender stereotypes, logical inconsistency and irrationality.

After reading Swift's article, one would think that there can be no understanding between genders. To quote, "(I)ov (I)oua man who does (understand feminism) and (I'll) show you a man who has had a sex change operation." Further on she writes, "(there is an entire female culture that men will never have access to.)"

Then is her closing paragraph Swift writes, "....occasionally you will meet a woman who genuinely appreciates what women face, but he will never truly understand."

If men are not capable of understanding women and are barred from feminine culture and perspective, why should they even try to understand? Swift characterizes males as being just lazy drunken bullies, if not predators. She denigrates what she identifies as male "habits" (drinking beer and watching football) as being just so much "male bonding crap," is that the extent of her understanding of "male culture?" The irrational shalowmindedness of such assertions speak for themselves.

In paragraph three, Swift writes of men, "(they) still think that any woman who is independent and strong is a lesbian." I am assuming that Swift is defining feminism as being incapable of supporting herself and feminism strength as a woman having the strength to assert herself and stand her ground. Where does she get the idea that men think of these as lesbian aims? How does a woman's choice in regard to her sexual preferences play into this? I can only speak from my own experience, but I know of no men seeking a woman who is a (b) financial invested and at worst a parasitic gold digger seeking to vamp them out of their resources.

The idea that men are only interested in weak women is like saying that men want to spend their lives with a trained seal. Sure, the seal does tricks, but the fun of that only lasts so long, and when it's gone, what's left? Do you have any idea how frustrating it is to deal with a woman who refuses to have any opinion of her own or make decisions without approval? I know of no friendships made up of one person who parrots the ideas and opinions of the other in order to be liked.

Swift begins her examples of male chauvinism by recounting her experience of being sexually harassed. She states that she was "laid off" for daring to suggest she was sexually harassed. Yet her position was not based upon performing sexual favors for her superiors, her ability to advance did not depend on her willingness to deep-end the way to the top and as far as I can tell, her agreeing to have sex with anyone was not a requirement for her job.

Ah, but she had to put up with all those male co-workers desiring her because she was female! How dare they look at an attractive (at least from a little Ayle Argoe and white) woman and express what they think. Unfortunately for Ms. Swift, she was born female.

Because of this, men will find her attractive and no lawsuit will change that.

To add to her argument that "blatant chauvinism" is one of the building blocks of our society, Swift refers to the Bobbitt case. I think that one would be hard pressed to find anyone who thinks of John Wayne Bobbitt as anything but a sonovitch, but that's as amazing as she would suggest by dismem-bering her husband, Lorena was "standing up for herself.

Is this the definition of a strong woman? A woman who was subjected to beatings over an extended period of time, remained with the man who was inflicting these beatings on her, and then took the role of the avenging vigilante whose goal was not to kill, but to prosecute. How empowering it must be to think on the Lorena Bobbitt example of "feminist power."

Finally, Swift caps her opinion by referring to the Simpson case, "I hope they roast him," writes Swift. Unless the trial has suddenly come to a conclusion and the jury has dumbed down a guilty verdict, O.J. is not guilty of anything yet. Apparently, she is willing to suspend guilty until proven innocent in the case of any male suspect of abusing a woman.

Perhaps it should be guilty until pronounced dead after execution in such cases. Isn't it interesting that Ms. Swift overlooks the violence of Lorena Bobbitt, yet is ready to kill a man whose guilt has not been proven?

Letters to the Editor

LaRocco's attacks amazing

I am continually amazed by the nature of attacks that LaRocco supporters level against Helesa Chenoweth. A letter to the Argonaut of Oct. 14 concerning Helesa Chenoweth is typical of what Larry LaRocco and his supporters have been doing: taking Chenoweth's statements out of context and to ridiculous extremes.

Her idea to abolish the U.S. Department of Education has drawn some serious fire, all from people who have not heard or choose to ignore the entire idea. The states would not lose any money because the grants that would be made to them with the money that would have gone to USDLE. That way, state and local officials could decide where the money could best be spent, rather than jumping through hoops help by federal bureaucrats. Because state's are the primary administrators of education already, there would be no need for any new organizations. The point of this idea is to give states more control over their education systems and eliminate federal bureaucracy. For some reason, Larry LaRocco can't stand local control or smaller government.

Critics have also claimed that Chenoweth does not represent Idaho values, but anyone who looks at LaRocco's voting record know that he is the one who does not represent Idaho. He votes for Clinton's liberal agenda again something like 80% of the time, including the Clinton budget. During that debate LaRocco admitted that messages coming into his office from consituates were running ten to one against the Clinton plan, but he voted for it anyway. Who is he representing? He also voted with the Democrats in Congress to suppress investigations of the House Post Office scandal and Whitewater. Ignore the rumors and lies spread by LaRocco supporters. Because he cannot stand on his record, they are the only way for him and his supporters to attempts to salvage his desperate campaign.

Celebrate 'Dancegiving' with Dance Theatre

Chrisette Eron
Staff

very night this week you can catch 25 artists in the PE Building dance studio from 7 to 11 p.m. You ask why would these students want to spend that much time in the PE Building? The answer is simple: these dedicated students are rehearsing for the upcoming University Theatre production, Dancegiving.

"Dance Theatre is a class that leads toward a presentation of a dance concert," said Professor Diane Walker, director of the production. "It's always a concert of original choreography by students and sometimes faculty." Students performing in Dancegiving are not just dance majors. "We have students performing from majors all across campus," said Walker. "Choreographers are all majors, but the choreographers don't have to be a dance major.

Dancegiving will be displayed many facets of dance. This will be a showcase of ballet, modern, jazz, and tap.

"All dances are released independently," said Walker. "I figured out that if a dancer were only in one dance, and if every dance was a separate show, she would be putting in 100 hours in one show. If we combine the shows, we have a total of four to five shows. It's a great way to try different costumes." Walker is concerned that Dance Theatre will be confused with the Theatre Department. "We are not affiliated with the Theatre Department," she said. "We are self-supporting. All our production costs are supported by ticket sales. We get no university money for production.

"Students get into a Theatre Arts production free, but they get mad if they go to another production in the same building, and have to pay.

Everyone involved in Dancegiving is responsible for putting on the production. This includes makeup, publicity, and costume. "I really give students the opportunity for professional development and leadership development," said Walker. "Some people think dance is frivolous. It's not. It trains people in leadership."

Choreographer Megan Macvie said that her dance, entitled "Inclusive Language," is "a religious piece with some pro-woman overtones.

Megan Gazdik, choreographer of the dance "Mascara," described her dance as "modem ballet. It's a bizarre abstract piece with a central conflict."

Both Macvie and Gazdik described choreographing as strenuous and tiring.

"Choreographing is like writing a chapter to a novel," said Macvie. "It takes a long time and you're always adding dances to your repertoire, because you use it for residence.

Gazdik described choreographing as "counting." "It's all you think about when you're sleeping or trying to sleep, during all your spare time and even when you're walking to class," she said.

Gina Hernandez, graduate student in Physical Education, choreographed the production's "Tap Extravaganza."

"It's interesting, I choreographed my dance in my dorm room at Mary Washington University in Virginia," said Hernandez. "It's a real energetic and crowd pleasing.

Hernandez's dance was performed at Mary Washington University during fall semester of 1993. "The first half of the set is set to a traditional Glen Miller melody, but I decided to experiment with the second half set to technio music, and it worked," she said.

Choreographer Eric Payton described her dance, entitled "Moira," as being based on water and its elements.

Payton said, "There's not a lot of movement. There's a lot of people doing the same thing at different times, and it's not set to music." Walker said they are hoping for a large audience turn out this year. "We aren't in homecoming ads, but we hope that people will think of us as part of homecoming," she concluded.

Dancegiving will be in the Hartung Theatre Oct. 21 and 22 at 8 p.m. and Oct. 23 at 2 p.m. Tickets are $6 for the general public, $5 for students and seniors and are available at ticket express.

Winters here, though, are really mild. Perth, located on the southeast coast, has never seen snow in its 200 year history, and the average daytime temperature this winter was 66-65 F. Perth is a very clean, modern city with just over a million people, and a look at a world map will show you how its isolated (6 hours flight to any other large city).

At Curtin University of Technology, less than 10% of the 18,000 students live on campus, so there isn't much going on here evenings or weekends.

Inter-collegiate sports don't exist, and neither does a Greek system (in fact, when I tried to explain what a fraternity was to a few guys, they laughed). Classes require more work, and are graded harder than most I've taken in the United States, but I've learned a lot.

Outside reading, independent thinking and analysis and class participation are expected from all.

Well, there's so much I could say, but my time here is short and it's a beautiful day. See you in January? P.S. If you're considering coming, talk to Bob Nourse at the International Program Office in Merrill Hall; he's helpful and friendly and can start you on your way.

Health Fair equals heart care
Shelby Beck
Staff

"Getting To The Heart of it," the sixth annual University of Idaho Health and Nutrition fair, commences Thursday in the Student Union Ballroom and Vandal Lounge.

Sponsored by the UI Student Health Service, the fair focuses this year on educating students to take care of their hearts.

"Heart disease is the number one killer of both American men and women," says Mary Schwantes, a nutritionist with UI Student Health Service and the fair coordinator.

"Half of all women who die in the United States, die of heart disease. People don't usually realize that. They think of breast cancer and other diseases, but not heart disease," says Schwantes.

The fair features 75 different exhibits from all over the United States, the USA. She says the exhibits cover the topics of fitness, recreation, physical health, health education and nutrition. Counseling groups will also be present to give information on keeping the emotions healthy.

"Free eye, dental and foot examinations are also available, as well as healthy food samples that are low in fat and high in fiber," says Schwantes. The food exhibit is marked, or assorted, with as by 20 by 30 inch ice sculpture of a heart which, says Schwantes, is being shipped up from Meridian, Idaho.

"It's a gorgeous ice carving set up to remind us that we're here to take care of our hearts," says Schwantes.

The first 100 people attending will be eligible for a five dollar discount on either a cholesterol test or a lipoprotein blood test. A program is available to those attending the fair to record individual test results such as flexibility, lung function, target heart rate and cholesterol measurements, among others.

The UI Health and Nutrition Fair takes place from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom and Vandal Lounge Oct. 20.

For more information, contact Nutritionist Mary Schwantes at 885-6603.

Escaping with 'No Way Out'
Mall Baldwin
Staff

When I first put the new D Generation disc into my player, I wasn't expecting much. Yet, as I listened I was filled with wonderment and awe at how skilled the band is. The music is loud and hard. All of it is filled with emotion that most bands forget to put into their music.

The CD isn't just about the music, it is about the lyrics accompanying the music. Songs like "No Way Out" are an outcry for help from our generation. "No Way Out" includes lyrics of passionately sung cries. "I've seen the movies and the grooves / and I'm searching for a reply / In the gutter with a promise / And I'm on my way." The song also speaks of suicide as a way out. "Whisper in my ear dear / tell me something / why does suicide have such appeal / never do it / No way—goin' like sailors / And Valentine failures / dashing rejection with walls of protection." The album is laced with fast paced songs that can be listened to over and over.

D Generation made it a band that wanted to be heard in the heart of the music scene. All of their songs are filled with a certain sadness and yearning for a release, like the song "Feel Like Suicide.

The questionable circumstances surrounding the victim's death and a growing reluctance to deal with the problem in his marriage to St. James to bring in Lyndy, who has his own weaknesses and need for diversions.

George formulates intense characters, describing them through their interactions with each other. Without descending, she leaves no doubt about what motivates each person. George creates acute suspense by developing an uncertainty on the reader's part as to whether the character had the most compelling reason to commit murder.

It is the motivation of her characters that, with plot, George uses to subtly relate to her audience the dangers of obsessive parental love.

George's book, Missing Joseph, is consuming with its unemptored plot twists and deft description of human behavior. Prepare to have your time absorbed by this gripping tale.

Lifestyles
The Beauney was full Thursday night—people sat in every chair, on the wide step between dining levels and directly on the floor at the front of the crowd. Eating specialty food and drinking coffee of various stripes, they waited patiently for Lance Olsen, University of Idaho English professor, to begin his presentation.

From Scherzi, I believe, Olsen chose the short story Watch and Ward, a fairly traditional narrative which he read in a fairly traditional manner—book in hand, live before the audience.

As an introduction to the story, Olsen said "I’m really nervous and finicky" and the inspiration for the story came from "my neighbor who lived next door in Lexington" whom he hated. It is a fantasy.

While he read, three television sets in the background played a graphic video (spinning cobwebs, animated bees, video game stuff). It wasn't something Olsen had prepared, it was started by the people who set up the equiment, but he said he liked it and left it on.

The story followed Jim Swenson's increased meddling with the aesthetics of his neighborhood. Olsen's light voice accentuated the ridiculous escalation of action.

For the second presentation, Olsen sat in the audience as they watched his "cyber-still" read a chapter from Tonguing the Zeigenbein. Behind Olsen's image splashed silent animation (on the order of Heavy Metal or MTV's Liquid Television) and various commercials for pizza, candy and Levi's. The whole image was rotated 90 degrees to the left.

Ziegfeld follows rock 'n roll wannabe Ben in a future where he willingly gives up everything to be a star, even undergoing surgical transformations. "I'm deeply, deeply affected by TV," Olsen said. "Zeigfeld" he said, it's about "the commercialization and televisionization of art."

Response tended to the extremes. A few people beat a hasty retreat; most milled, chattered, and expressed appreciation of Olsen's work and the support Book People and the Beauney give local artists. Both books are avaiable at Book People.

Lance Olsen reads from his book "Scherzi, I believe" at the Beauney last Thursday evening.

People: Scherzi is a limited edition of 250 copies signed by Olsen and his wife, Andi Olsen, who created the accompanying collages.

VANDALS

Overall, the Vandals dominated offensively with 28 first downs compared to MSU's 12. The time of possession was also in Idaho's favor — 36:12 to 23:48. Defensive lineman Ryan Phillips, just a sophomore, anchored the Vandal defense with 10 tackles, four of which went for losses and one sack.

The Vandal defensive starters from the first game of the season — Miregi Huma, Tommy Knecht, Jason Shilt, Josh Fetter and Arnold Guen — did not play Saturday. Penalties, once again, were the only obvious negative for Idaho. Flags were thrown 11 times totaling 111 yards.

Smith didn't even want to comment on this, but said "there's always something you've got to work on."

Idaho plays Northern Arizona on Saturday for Homecoming at 1:05 in the Kiddie Dome.

UI Soccer Club splits games

The University of Idaho Soccer Club trounced the Lewiston-Clarkston team 7-2 in Clarkston Saturday and narrowly lost 4-3 to Eastern Oregon State College at Guy Wicks on Sunday.

Center midfielder Dowen Raynor dominated the scoring in UI's win, opening the game with a penalty kick and then tallying on three additional shots—one on an assist from J.B. Blessinger, one on an assist from Roy Turner and one unassisted.

Raynor also registered an assist when he sent a corner kick to the head of team captain Jayson Transtrum. Lenford O'Garo scored on an assist from Andy Aviles and defender Dave Davis rounded out the scoring for Idaho on an assist from Transtrum. Lance Metzger scored both goals for the Lewiston-Clarkston club.

Davis and Pat Kirk led a strong UI defense and Errol Kochman played well in his first appearance as goalie.

In Saturday's game, O'Garo opened the scoring for Idaho on an assist from Raynor, but Eastern Oregon rallied for a 2-1 first half lead.

In the second half, EQSC took advantage of Idaho playing a man down after a red card to add two more goals.

Following an altercation that saw one player red carded from each team, UI countered with a pair of goals, one by Jayson Transtrum (assist by Raynor) and one by defender Bob Jochem off of a corner by O'Garo.

The UI record stands at 4-4-1 for the season. The team plays in Sandpoint next weekend.
