Third UI presidential finalist drops out of race

Associated Press

BOISE — Idaho higher education officials say they are interviewing for a new University of Idaho president.

On Monday, David Doyley, provost of Moscow State University, announced he was stepping down for family considerations, citing differing opinions on the role and mission of the Idaho university. It marks the second time this month a final candidate pulled out after an interview.

A third finalist, Tom Shibayama, president of California State University Long Beach, withdrew from consideration in mid-February after his wife expressed concern about moving and members of the community implored him to stay in California.

Education Commissioner Mark Browning declined to comment on the factor in Doyley's decision.

In a statement released by the board, Doyley said after several months of searching, he and the board "mutually agreed that our different perspectives for the role, scope and future of the University of Idaho were not the right fit at this time."

He did not immediately return Associated Press calls to his campus or Strayhorn, Mont., home.

A campus search committee has signifies its goal of finding a replacement for Tim White, who stepped down last month.

Times are tough. According to a survey by the National Association of Colleges and Employers, recruiting by prospective employers is down 2 percent on college campuses nationwide.

"Regardless of your degree, employment is not a guarantee," said Lauren Berwick, manager for employer relations and continuing education at the Career and Internship Planning Office at UI.

Berwick would know. After earning her bachelor's in countryside and Student Affairs degree, she decided to work in the field of matchmaking where she found a job at the University of Idaho.

"It's definitely a more competitive job market these days," Berwick said, "but people who are looking for work are still showing up at interviews because they're uncertain of their future."

Berwick encouraged students who are on the verge of entering the job market to be creative when applying for jobs.

"Depending on NACE, business, engineering, and technical majors are in demand due to the undergraduate degree, and jobs in the federal government appear to be the best but for the most part, fewer people are demanding," according to the group's 2009 job outlook. "Individuals might need to do some retraining of what's on their resume and what skills they present," Berwick said. "A journalist who

Before Idaho declared a tragedy in 1886, the long arm of the law had little reach to the area. An outgrowth of bands and outlaws from California and Nevada rode in the wake of the gold rush and overrode miners' strikes. By 1889, the towns and mining camps were a lawless wasteland, opening the door for official law enforcement.

He is retired from the army and is trying to find the money to work on the creek once again.

Rerouting the creek

The U.S. Army Corps of En-

rerouting of the creek in January 2007. The plan includes a project for rerouting the creek back to its original location.

According to the plan, one cause the creek needs to be rerouted is flooding concerns. The channels have become too wide in 1996, said Raymond Pakker, manager of the Department of Architecture and Environmental Engineering. "In the flood seasons," he said, "the creek used to flow out of the".

Why do we have laws for everything?

As one of the most freedom loving people in America, you'd think those who believe in general liberties in a way almost no one else does, would be the ones who have a right to be left alone to do what we want is something occasionally encountered.

But a curiosity to this knowledge, there are a few equally strong desires to do all kinds of things, become a paranoid fascist, or even become lazy and aloof about policy every aspect of existence. Annual event celebrates Native American cultures

Jordan Gray

Sometimes the best way to get a feel for another culture is simply to see what its celebrations are like. The University of Idaho Native American Pow Wow Celebration Week brings a variety of performers and participants to campus to celebrate Native American cultures and traditions, with the week culminating in the 10th annual Native American Pow Wow.

This is traditionally the last Pow Wow of the year, so we’re really trying to incorporate a lot of different elements into the events and getting some of their tribal members to speak about things.

One of the events in the week-long Pow Wow is a performance by the Idaho Commons Whitewater Room at 7 p.m. All events throughout the week are free.

In keeping with this, Native Pow Wow storyteller Angel Su- blette will perform songs in the Idaho Commons Whitewater Room at 7 p.m. All events throughout the week are free.

To hear the word play- weight may conjure up images of William Shakespeare and Arthur Miller. But for a tribe of Pennsylvania Indians, it should bring up visions of Native American stories and history.

The Native American Pow Wow Week features new plays from UI students and other performers to put forth their personal perspectives, and the event is part of the continued celebration of the cultural performance, and this week saw the first readings of two different Native American plays.

All of the plays are being performed by members of the Fiji Acoma tribe. One of the plays is directed by David Vivian, who directed the Chicago-based production of "The Last of the Mohicans" last year, and he will have his own play, "Stolen," performed at the festival.

The festival is one of the first readings is to give a chance for audi- ences to see and enjoy new works.

"The festival is one of the first readings is to give a chance for audi- ences to see and enjoy new works. And I think we’re interested in exploring the cultural process and how you show big production values in a reading." Matthew Rubell, an MFA in writing candidate, got involved with the Native American Pow Wow after her play "The Shintoist" was selected for the subsequent Powder Keg Reading Series.

Books for women about how they are wrong or have been wronged in relationship stories are nearing a dime a dozen.

Authors approach solutions for brokenhearted females in a variety of ways. "Flynn" by Dana 2009, "Stupid About Men: 10 Rules for Getting Romance Right!" by Deborah Dunn, and "Stupid About Men: 10 Rules for Getting Romance Right!" by Deborah Dunn, both of these by challenging feminist ideals. Dunn takes the princesses and fairy tale maidens of pre-school days and fantasy fantasies.

``Stupid About Men" has the same information any other dating book would carry, but the presentation is key. Dunn makes it simple for readers to grasp the information they need and want because they're read. Tinkerbell needs to remember being smart is more important than being sexy, and Rapunzel needs to find a guy that's not interested in how long she asks her to let down her hair.

``Stupid About Men" and family therapist, interns real life calls from her clients, having credibility but also inserting unnecessary commentary about spirituality and higher powers into her instruction and living happily. These God-related comments are apologetic for those interested or involved with religious or theological purposes, but not as a repellent for those who are not.

Those details can go unnoticed for post and the purpose of Dunn's book remains the same regardless; wake up, realize what examples you're holding yourself to and change your mind about how you are instead of dwelling in the shadow of aching hearts.

Vandals to watch

Evan Road

Road, a transfer from Central Washington University, is set to be a key player this season. He will be in the lineup with a height of 6’11’’ and a weight of 295. It was Road’s first year competing in Idaho uniforms and he managed to hit a regional qualifying mark. He received a scholarship from transfer Eugenio Manzuoli and is expected to help fill the gap left by the graduation of American Russ Wingert.

Kyle Haak

Haak, a senior, threw a career-best 206-11 Wednesday at thena All-Idaho Invitational. His effort was good enough to secure him second place in the event. The tour was good enough to secure a regional qualifying mark, and it is expected to give him the ability to provide good depth for the upcoming Mountain West Conference Championships down the road.

The University of Idaho women’s basketball team has signed back-to-back seniors for next season. One being Katrina Brown with the Gatawie Player of the Year Award. The other is San Diego State’s McDonald’s All-American for the second year in a row.

The Idaho Vandals softball team qualified for the practice field last week with a win over Boise State in both the regular season championship and the first day of the regular season. The Yellowjackets are now expected to get into the top four of their new family and will stay on top of the list with their winning streak.

If the old adage “everyone loves a winner” could fault the women on the University of Idaho Black Widows women’s rugby team for feeling like they were winning others’ child.

Despite not having lost a game since last spring, captain Courtney Brockett has yet to be fully embraced by the community.

“There are a few miscom-prehensions about what we do,” Brockett says. “I think trying to get away from being underestimated is a good place for us to start.”

Because of the new classification following this year’s season, the Black Widows will participate in the newly-formed Western Collegiate Rugby Conference, which consists of nine conferences, and home games to end the se-son.

“We hope to win the rest of games leading up to Maggofest in Montana at the beginning of May.”

Brockett joined the squad two years ago and said she has seen the team grow a lot in that time. “I remember only having four or five girls show up to practice and not being able to work on anything,” Brockett said. “Now we have a full squad with a bunch of girls who are committed to the sport.”

One of the biggest mismatches about rugby is the idea one has to be big and strong to play the sport, Howard said.

“My goal is to just make Moesucker aware that there is a wom-nuggets for training in the region. Howard said. “Not only that, but we are successful and have a lot of fun.”

nament next weekend.

as Chenoweth, but he played college football just up the road at Eastern graduated and spent three years on the coaching staff.

After two years at EWU, Erna moved on to Eastern Oregon for three years. During the 2006 and 2007 seasons, Erna served as the defensive coor-

Before coming to Idaho, he was serving as the assistant head coach, defensive coordinator

Erna said he believes the Idaho football program is on the rise, and he's excited to be a part of it.

"It was a great opportunity, "Erna said, "I was

As the defensive line coach, Erna knows his importance on the field and wants his players to understand their importance as well.

"What I'm hoping to bring to the team is a little bit of energy, as well as some fundamentals to be better up front," Erna said. "There's a lot weighing on the front, and I want the front to understand they're accountable for this football team."

Although it's time to get to work, Erna said he has really enjoyed Moscow, and it's the kind of place he wants to raise his family. "I'm not a fan of
