State Senate considers juvenile crime bill

They're gonna play like adults, they're gonna live like adults," said freshman Brandon Bluntart. He was speaking on trying juveniles as adults for drug offenses.

The Idaho State Senate is considering a bill that would toughen enforcement of adult sentencing for minors. It is intended to counteract major drug dealers, mainly in southern Idaho, who have used minors to tell their wars and thereby insulate themselves from prosecution.

Bill Thompson, Latah County prosecutor, said he didn't think there would be "any significant impact in this county" if the bill was passed into law.

He pointed out that there were only three misdemeanor possession of marijuanas or the related paraphernalia cases in Latah last year.

James "Doc" Lucas, a long-time member of the Legislature, calls charging juveniles as adults "absolutely ridiculous."

"You could keep him [as minor] 15 years longer. If he was a vicious and violent person," Lucas said. "It's a law worth having. But this is a tremendous abuse of that law.

Freshman Melissa Chavez said, "I think the laws on drugs are way too harsh already."

She said that the laws regarding marijuanas are particularly unnecessary. "It should be classified just like alcohol — don't do it on the job," she said.

Henri White, a horticulture major, said that longer sentences wouldn't help.

"It's part of growing up, you make mistakes," he said. "I don't think making the punishment more severe is going to take care of that."

As the law stands now, minors 14 years old or older who are charged with drug violations within 1,000 feet of a primary or secondary school can be tried as adults.

Locally, Thompson said, "I think it would be highly unlikely to see a 14-year old go to the penitentiary on a drug type of charge.

He said what is more probable is a 17 year old, particularly one that is "essentially emancipated" from his parents, would face prison time.

"The longer sentencing doesn't help the problems," said Stacy Frei, an elementary education major. "I believe in rewards. She said that the money used in housing and prosecuting the violators would be better spent in programs helping them change their lifestyle.

Kristy Trout said, "Some people can be 14 and be an adult, not physically, but mentally be an adult. It depends, I think. They should try each case separately."

She did say, however, that the law might help. "They might be more scared to do it."

Crews clean streets, check dorm rooms over break

Maintenance will walk through, check for damage

While students are living it up over spring break, University of Idaho maintenance crews will be hard at work. From March 16 to 20 Faculty Maintenance staff members will be entering Residence Hall rooms to examine the condition of the rooms and determine what is needed for repairs, replacement or painting.

"It's a two person crew. We're going to ascertain how bad the painting is, how bad the carpetboard is, and if the countertops are in real rough shape we're going to do our best to plan to replace them over the summer," said Chuck Labine, associate director for Facilities Maintenance.

He said they will also examine mattresses because they are planning on replacing many by next year. Students' belongings will not be disturbed. Posters and contact paper on countertops will be left intact.

"If it's not obvious, we're not going to mess with it. We're not going to touch anything. We're not interested in what's in it's cupboards," Labine said.

Because it is only a two-person crew covering more than 1,000 rooms, he said the inspection will be a just a walk through. "We just want to get a general idea how much work we have this summer," he said.

No major work will be done over spring break. Teams have been painting in Walker Complex, and there might be some patchwork done in Gault and Upham. "There won't be a lot we can to while the students are on vacation," Labine said.

Sophomore Deena Hatfield said she thinks the inspections are a good idea. "There are a lot of things that need to be fixed that they aren't getting done during the summer, and if they actually come in and check the rooms and identify the problems, they might actually get something done this summer," she said.

Hatfield has a hole in the wall of her dorm room that was there when she moved in. It was listed on her damage report so it was from last year. "They're great with temporary maintenance, but there are a lot of major projects that need to be done over the summer," she said.

Other work done on campus will be a street cleanup. UI Facilities management is requesting that all vehicles be removed from Seventh, Elm, Idaho, Blake, Sweet, Nez Perce, University and Paradise Creek Streets. Extra parking will be available in the Kibbie Dome west gravel lot.

Charles Zillingler, associate director of Landscape and Exterior Services, said the Moscow police will make an effort to contact owners of parked cars left on those streets, but if they cannot be reached, the vehicles will be removed. There is a Moscow ordinance that allows vehicles left over 48 hours to be towed.

Zillingler said they are taking advantage of this time to gain access to areas that are inaccessible when students are present three hours a day. They will be removing rocks and sediment that collected during the winter. "We're starting to get ready for commencement," he said.

House endorses changes to bill keeping tobacco from minors

BOISE — After hours of intense debate, the House has endorsed changes to a Senate-passed bill aimed at keeping tobacco out of the hands of minors.

Parents, retailers, tobacco companies and lawmakers reached a consensus Tuesday on the proposed changes that the measure’s supporters insist do not water down the legislation.

The House adopted the modifications late Tuesday and could formally approve the amended bill by week’s end. It must still be returned to the Senate for its consideration of the changes.

Vending machine operators gained the most ground in the latest battle over the bill authored by the Idaho Parent-Teacher Association. Owners would have until January 2000 to get rid of the machines. The Senate version had barred them beginning next year, but retailers feared the move would put vending companies out of business too soon.

Advocate Carya Espinol called the year postponement a good compromise since the bill still requires vending machine owners to have a permit to sell tobacco.

All tobacco retailers must get free state permits under the legislation, that also mandates that tobacco products be kept behind counters or in locked displays to thwart shoplifting.

"It was a grueling process," Espinol said after a series of late-night bargaining sessions that put retailers, tobacco companies, health advocates and lawmakers face to face.

"But the integrity of the bill still exists."

What you should know about your skin and the killer sun

Candice Long

Spring break means students are gearing up to spend some quality time in the sun. But the University of Idaho Women's Center is "trying to get the word out about melanoma," said Women's Resource Specialist Susan Palmer, in hopes students will think twice when exposing their skin to harmful rays.

Mary Kale, a public information specialist with UI Communications and a melanoma survivor, spoke at the Women's Center brown-bag lunch program Tuesday to provide information on melanoma, those at risk, and the effects and treatment. Having been diagnosed with melanoma three times, she believes prevention and early detection is better than going through the treatment.

"I'm not a medical professional, but because of my personal experience with melanoma, I feel like I have an obligation to friends and strangers to say what I know to be true," Kale said. "I want to emphasize that melanoma is not just a little skin cancer — it's a potentially deadly skin cancer."

Kale has been dealing with melanoma, which means "black tumor," since the age of 18. She believes people have a preconceived notion that people with naturally dark skin don't get skin cancer.

"The truth is anyone can get it," Kale said.

"Melanoma can occur anywhere on the body, even where the sun doesn't shine."

According to the Skin Cancer Foundation, people who are at high risk of getting melanoma include anyone with a family history of malignant melanoma, a person with fair skin, light hair, light eye color, or a tendency to sunburn easily. Other factors can also include having unusual or large brown moles at birth and a record of painful or blistering sunburns, especially from a young age.

Kale said melanoma is the most frequent cancer among women aged 25 to 29, and the second most frequent (after breast cancer) among women aged 30-34. In 1997, 60,000 Americans were diagnosed with melanoma and it takes the lives of nearly 7,200 people every year.

It is recommended that people do a simple monthly exam after a bath or shower and stand in front of a full-length mirror to check any moles, blisters or birthmarks, making sure there is no change in size, shape or color. And if the proper sunscreen is applied and people avoid being in the sun between the 11 a.m. and 4 p.m., the chances of getting melanoma are slim.

"I know staying out of the sun and taking precautions is a pain, but fighting melanoma is much worse," Kale said.

For more information on melanoma, call the National Cancer Institute's Cancer Information Service at 1-800-4-CANCER.
A comment period is open for proposed national standards for what food can be labeled "organic." Currently, there are no national standards, and certification of organic products is conducted by 17 states and 23 private organizations. While the standards don't always conform completely, they generally prohibit the use of chemical pesticides, herbicides, and toxic fertilizers. In California, for example, food labeled as organic is grown only on ground that has been free from chemicals for at least three years.

That definition of organic will change drastically if the standards proposed by the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) go into effect. The definition will change so radically because the proposed standards allow genetically engineered foods, genetically modified bacteria toxins to be used for pest control, radiation, unspecified use of antibiotics on livestock, toxic sludge sewage waste fertilizer, 20 percent non-organic food for livestock, confinement of livestock, and the use of 130 substances listed by the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) as "potentially toxic" in production of foods labeled as "organic."

As far as I know, the militia movement isn't concerned about this issue, but situations like this one accentuate the credibility of those who claim that our government is out of touch, and out of control. Where does the USDA get off redefining the term organic? What gives them the right? I, like many of you, have been living hand to mouth for quite a while. I know how easy it is to rationalize any sort of cost cutting measure, such as buying food that isn't organic. Increasingly I find myself buying and eating organic food. I feel better, and I also feel it is important to support growers who are gentle on the land and water. I'm still low income, but I am finding that it is important to me at this time to invest in the health of our agriculture land, our ground and surface water, and me. It does cost more to eat organic, but I feel it is worth the price. Municipal sewage systems collect and process 11.6 million pounds of waste every year. The remaining sludge is referred to as "biosolids," and often contains some or more of the following carcinogenic substances: amnic, mercury, lead, asbestos, PCBs, dioxins, industrial solvents, and petroleum products. Two Oregon steel mills supplied 28.8 million pounds of toxic waste to a fertilizer producer over five years. The EPA has approved the use of biosolids and other toxic waste on conventional crops, which is plenty disturbing. VIPs should be praised for their hospitality

The University of Idaho athletic department received much help recruiting this year from the Vandal VIPs. The VIP program is a relatively new program, started in the spring of 1995 by head football coach Chris Tormey. The program consists of a group of approximately 20 dedicated student volunteers. They give freely of their time and energy, and through their contributions, the UI athletic department has been able to land top recruits in volleyball, football, women's basketball, and men's basketball.

The VIPs assist the coaches by giving campus and facility tours, banquets, projects, accompanying recruits to academic meetings, practices, and informing them of "student life" at UI.

The VIP program is more than just recruiting, however. It is an image builder for the athletic department and the four sports in particular, as well as the entire university. High school and junior college students come to visit UI, and expect the same situation they meet at other universities.

Here, however, the VIPs make a difference by relating the recruits and making them feel more comfortable during their visit to UI.

The VIPs provide a link to the student body that is sometimes missing at other college institutions. The athlete has someone to talk to and someone to go to for advice. I have found out about classes, the community, professors, members of the team, and other things. They provide a student's view of everything from living groups to games and entertainment. Kim McClary, an assistant football coach and VIP Coordinator, says it allows the recruits to have the opportunity to talk to someone who isn't an athlete, allows them to get another viewpoint of the school beyond the coaches and athletic department — and gives them a chance to "meet another face."

Head women's basketball coach Julie Holt says the Vandal VIP program is great. It's "advantageous not only to the athletic department, but also to participating students. We have great people on this campus, and probably one of our best resources is the students here at the University of Idaho are our best selling point."

Weslee Lee, a sophomore majoring in secondary education and communications, is actively involved in the Vandal safety program. She joined the "staff" in the spring of '95, and thinks it's a wonderful program.

"It's important to me because I get to help somebody get to know a place in a short time, and help them, or advise them with a big decision in their life. I get to meet a lot of people and prospective students, and I have a lot of fun doing it," Lee says.

The athletic department is looking to add to their VIP program. Interested students can contact Coach McClary at 885-0231.
It's high time to renovate campus buildings
Let the demolition begin!

LOCKE AND CO. PROCEED WITH 'ONE STOP SHOPPING'

Clearinghouse would provide information on environmental restrictions

Bow to Gov. Gary Locke and six federal agencies who recently signed a "memorandum of understanding" on what one can hope will result in creation of a "one-stop shop" to enable farmers and foresters to better contend with new environmental restrictions to restore salmon.

The one-stop shop could provide a central clearinghouse for consistent, reliable information so that farmers and ranchers won't be forced to chase around trying to determine what the regulations are and how they apply to them. Further, the center could streamline the process by which the private landowners obtain approval for their actions to comply with the regulations and make it easier for them to obtain government aid to help restore salmon habitat on their property and adjacent lands.

This approach by government seems to be providing some incentives for private landowners to comply with prospective new land use regulations in behalf of salmon. It is much more sensible than the heavy-handed, do-or-die-type approach government has sometimes taken in enforcing regulations and is more likely to produce positive results as landowners are more inclined to be cooperative.

A proactive attitude from private landowners affected by the prospective federal listing of salmon species in western Washington as endangered will be an essential part of efforts to restore salmon.

It may be that some of the prospective regulations on private landowners will be overkill, or perceived as such. But at least give government credit this time for apparently being more sensitive, and sensible, in its approach to imposing new regulations.

The Admin Building...would make a prime location for a campus parking garage.

Ridengaull Hall and Merrill Hall are both much too old. Their demolition would make space for UI McDonald's North and UI McDonald's South, which would save students from having to walk or drive to the other two Moscow McDonald's locations and give them the opportunity to bow and submit to the Almighty American Culture Icon right here on campus

Brink Hall is long overdue to be exploded, but it could be salvaged for fundraising purposes. The rooms, currently used as faculty office space, are just the right size for 20 or 30 Nike workers. Just think what kind of cool new shoes and sweatshirts we would have if we became the Nike University of Idaho and produced overpriced shoes as well as overpriced degrees. Of course, the shoes and sweatshirts would cost more than they do currently, but that's the price you have to pay for Nike quality. Don't forget: someone has to feed the shoes sewing the shoes together in Brink. Dead slaves don't work, and new slaves cost money. As Gary Trudeau once suggested, we must prepare ourselves for the hyper-sportswear environment.

The UCC is the one building on campus that should be left alone as it is obviously the prototype by which the administration hopes to base all future buildings. Windows and proper ventilation are distracting to a student's education, and thus must be avoided at all costs. For this reason, all buildings on campus that do not undergo renovation suggestions should at least have their windows boarded up and the air vents plugged.

This university must appeal to students of the future to compete. My ideas are only an indication of the brave new direction in which our university is headed.

A gallery review by Amy Sanderson

Photographer John Owens is more than just resourceful. Using everything from a Thermos to an electrical plug, Owens creates his own functional cameras. After searching out kickknacks in antique stores or items from everyday life, Owens transforms his found objects into original pinhole cameras.

"I've always had a fascination with objects...I've now combined that interest with photography," said Owens.

A pinhole camera created by Owens is one of many works currently displayed at the SUB Gallery. The undergraduate/graduate exhibit features a large group of paintings, ceramics, mixed media and sculpture from both art students and those outside of the art department.

Attracting nearly 100 applicants, the annual exhibit had the largest turnout ever. Forty-six of the entered artworks are shown in the exhibit.

"There was work that there wasn't room for that had to be turned down but was still high quality work," said Assistant Art Professor Richard Higgs who organizes and runs the SUB Gallery. Gail Siegel, director of the Picard Art Gallery, served as judge.

Owens' work, Photographs and Camera, won one of 10 awards given with the exhibit. The piece presented fingerprint-sized images created from one of Owens' curious image making devices, this time a plastic toy thumb.

"I'll make a camera and then decide on images it lends itself to...the whole idea of thumbs relates to an artist holding his thumb up to look at his work or to value judgments. thumbs up and down," said Owens.

Pinhole cameras, the forerunners to the modern camera, were developed hundreds of years ago. Traditionally made from small, light tight boxes, pinhole cameras project an image through a tiny opening onto a photographic material placed inside, which didn't become available until the 19th century. Owens, creating his cameras in the same manner, places a piece of tape over the needle sized hole. A picture is then "snapped" by ripping the tape off to expose the film. The effect is often a surreal, photolike image, explained Owens.

Although Owens began his career as a straight photographer, he was drawn to make these hit and miss images for the lack of control and spontaneity. "If I make four or five thumb images, one might come out," said Owens.

Cyanoptya, a 150-year-old photography process producing fingerprint sized prints in another of Owens' chosen mediums. More of Owens' pinhole cameras and other artworks can be found at his website, <http://www.widsaho.edu/owen1616/>.

Best of Show at the graduate level for the SUB exhibit went to Kory Rountree, now winning the award twice in a row. Rountree's painting, half hours worth of korens, is a large scale mixed media work covered in rich and vivid colors. Mixing drawings, text and painst, Rountree then mounted his work on torn boards and uneven frames giving the look of a work in progress right out of an artist's studio.

Rebecca Weeks won Best of Show for her hip sculpturecoat hung from the gallery wall. The coat made from clear film vinyl and several zippers is grabbing the attention of gallery visitors. Weeks is currently working on an entire line of art as clothing and sculpture.

Bay Area jam: Much ado about Zero

What do you get when you add six premiere Bay Area musicians with one former Grateful Dead lyricist? Zero! This Grateful Dead/Phish/Allman Brothers/Hot Tuna reminiscent group released its self-titled CD last December. This album comes four long years after the live CD Chance in a Million, which featured guest performances from music legends Fred Sears (before he moved on to tickle the ivories with Hot Tuna). John Kahn, and Dead keyboardist Vince Welnick.

The band came together in 1984 when guitarist Steve Kimock and drummer Greg Anton started jamming in a converted horse barn in Marin County, Calif. Soon after, the original band members performed their first gig in a tiny bar in Fairfax, Calif., and Zero has been growing in popularity since. They have seen band members come and go in the 14 years they have been together, but their current members are Anton, Kimock, bassist Bobby Vega, saxophonist extraordinare Martin Fierro, vocalist Judge Murphy, and pianist/keybroadist Chip Roladin.

Zero is definitely the product of its peers (the aforementioned jam bands) with their short spurts of vocals connecting long, noflet guitar solos and celestial keyboard jams that stretch into endless peaks and valleys before rolling seamlessly into the next tune. Judge Murphy's strong, Hell's-Angel-with-a-rhythm voice adds a gritty, bluesy touch to the music. Steve Kimock, who has played in such renowned groups as the Merli Saunders Rainforest Band, delivers guitar work that so closely mirrors that of Jerry Garcia's one might very well mistake the two. Martin Fierro is by far one of the band's finest additions. Hailing from El Paso, he left his home state at an early age and has since gone on to play his horn with a long list of varied musicians, from The Mothers of Invention to The Jerry Garcia Band. He joined Zero in 1985 and has been with them ever since.

Dead composer/lyricist Robert Hunter's union with the band was inevitable. His cerebral, yet spiritual lyrics that worked well with the Dead's ethereal jams new meets their austur mate again with Zero. In the latest album, Hunter's lyrical subject matters range from tales of wandering people engaged in "On the Road" style soul search to heartbreaksing references to the Wounded Knee incident. His words are simple and melodic but the prose that he builds is delightfully complex. Grateful Dead fans who lingered endlessly over his lyrics from that era will continue to do so with Zero.

During spring break, Zero will play a three day stint in Fayetteville, Ark. at Chester's Place, an intimate 250 seat venue. If you happen to be a Razorback home on break, catch the show. Otherwise, if you enjoy classic, well-rounded jam style blues/rock tunes, pick up Zero's Chance in a Million or the latest CD, Zero. For more information, set lists, and show dates, check out their website at <www.rockweb.com/hands/zero>.
It's spring break all over the place
by Travis Bommersbach
The snow is gone, the days are longer, and the smell of vacation is in the air. This can only mean one thing: spring break is upon us. This is a chance for students to take a week off from classes and not worry about the pressures and commitments of academic life; the opportunity to travel to far off exotic places or stay at home on the couch and sleep for a week straight.

Whether you have $15 or $300, there are activities and adventures to be sought no matter where you are. The key element over the holiday should be fun, fun, fun.

The most popular place for local spring breakers this year seems to be Mazatlan, Mexico. A place where the average temperature in the spring is near 75 degrees and an area known for the most beautiful sunsets on the west coast of Mexico.

"Mazatlan seems to be the biggest place for spring break this year. We've had bookings for reservations as far back as August, which is very rare," said Anna Eiselein of Neely's Travel Service.

Another hot spot for south of the border festivities is Puerto Vallarta.

"Lastly I've had almost more calls about Puerto Vallarta than Mazatlan and Hawaii and California which are also popular," said Jill Zimmerman of Fly Away Travel.

An agent from Departures Travel says that Mazatlan seems to be the place to be this year, but there have also been numerous reservations to the South Padre Island, Hawaii, the Southwest, and even Alaskan cruises.

The prices for these trips and air fare varies on how far in advance and where you are going, but for the Hawaii and Mexico vacations expect to dish out around $600 for a week in paradise.

There are alternatives to spending such extreme amounts of cash to have a good time. The only downside is that you are more likely to get cropped off on a sandy white beach in 75 degree weather. Right now you can fly from Seattle to Spokane for around $80 to $90 and escape the closer effect of Moscow and just get out of town.

If you're not quite ready to give into spring yet, don't worry because winter is sticking around. Spring break can also be winter break on the slopes next week. Schweitzer Mountain is offering an incredible special on lift tickets for $15. During the weekdays you can cut the cost of skiing almost in half and won't have to travel too far or spend much bread.

If funds or school work won't allow for you to take off for too long, camping could be a nice get away for a reasonably inexpensive price. There are numerous campsites and parks to take advantage of next week that allow you to get out of town and relax without costing too much time or money.

The UI Outdoor Program offers several vacation opportunities over the break including a Canadian Rockies skiing and ice climbing trip to the north and a desert exploration back packing trip to the south.

Another option to saving money is to rent all of your outdoor equipment at the Outdoor Rental Center here on campus. You can get skis, camping gear, and just about anything else to suit your spring break needs without spending an arm and a leg.

You can go anywhere and do anything during your time off next week. Spend money of money and travel far away or skimp and save your cash. Either way, have a fun and safe adventure and don't forget: you do have to come back.

Sharon Olds reads her poetry tonight

by Mike Last

Poetry is the most self-expressing and easily relatable form of art. It creates and recreates and it holds the power to move. Anyone who has lived can relate to good poetry, whether in a concrete or abstract reading; but in the world today, poetry is a thankless errand.

More dime store paperbacks are read than good poetry books, it seems. Romance novels and fantasy books appear to circulate quicker, but thanks to the UI English (grammatical engineering) department, poet Sharon Olds has arrived to revive the popularity of the art.

Before the reading, Olds gave a poetry workshop to selected students. Out of 38 applicants, only 13 were chosen to participate. That is an unusually large number of applications for a poetry class, according to the English department secretary.

Through her books and other publications, Olds has become a very accomplished writer. She studied at Stanford University and Columbia University, and released her first book in 1980. Her poems have appeared in The New Yorker, The Paris Review, The Nation, and Poetry. Her books include Susan SAYS, which won her the Inaugural San Francisco Poetry Center Award.

Her second book, The Dead and the Living, was the Lamont Poetry Selection for 1985, and the winner of the National Book Critics Circle Award. She has also received a grant from the National Endowment of The Arts, and a Guggenheim Foundation Fellowship.

She teaches poetry workshops at New York University, Columbia University, and Goldwater Hospital, in New York.

David Leavitt, of The Village Voice, in catalog of The Dead and the Living, “Her best work exhibits a lyrical acidity which is both purifying and redemptive. She sees description as means to catharsis, and the result is impossible to forget.”

The poems “Topography,” from her third book, The Gold Cell, is a good example of Sharon Olds’ poetry. This poem takes a fresh look at copulation, portraying it as two maps set together face to face. She uses repetition like, “My/New Orleans deep in your Texas, your Idaho/Deep in my Great Lakes, my Kansas/burning against your Kansas, your Kansas/burning against my Kansas” which heightens both the intensity and the cadence. Her poetry also excellently counters what readers expect, as she does in the end of “Topography”:

“all our cities twin cities/all our states united, uninhibited, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.”

Olds also has a wonderful sense of sounds such as, “soft, tarry surface” and “softly, slowly, talking to him, talking, talking” (all vowels biting on the same tone) in the poem “Summer Solution, New York City.”

A book signing and reception hosted by BookPeople of Moscow follows the reading. The reading is in the University of Idaho Law Building Courtyard at 7:30 p.m. Admission is free and open to the public.

A Look Ahead

- Poet Sharon Olds will give a public reading from her own work at 2:00 p.m. in the University of Idaho Law Building Courtyard. Admission is FREE! Olds has published several books, including: The Wellspring, The Dead and the Living, and Susan Says. A book signing and reception will follow. The books, however, are not FREE. They must be paid for with American dollars.

- There’s an exhibit at the Pichard Art Gallery that continues through April 8, featuring the works of Glen Bach and Mel Stawn. Glen Bach’s work is entitled Creating the Sound Barrier and is composed of digital mixed media. Mel Stawn’s work also consists of digital mixed media and is titled Transformations. So deep these potatoes and get cultured!

- Spring break is here, and with this joyous occasion comes the death of Moscow, its livelihood (the students) will look out of tall blood rushing from a socking chest wound. Moscow will be lifeless; a cold still corpse. Activity will come and the streets will be silent. It is because of this lack of "social happenings" that it becomes necessary to fill the "Look Ahead" box with a bevy of metaphors and pointless imagery about a very simple concept, such as the fact that there will be nothing going on in Moscow for the next week. Enjoy yourselves, and see you in a few.
Holt leaves Idaho to reunite family

Tonya Snyder
Sports Editor

At a Wednesday morning press conference University of Idaho women's head basketball coach Julie Holt announced her departure from the Vandals to rejoin her family in Louisville, Ky.

A football, Nick, the former defensive coordinator for the Idaho football team, accepted another position at the University of Louisville in December. Since then, Holt and her two sons, Nick IV, 5, and Den, 1, have been stationed in Moscow and with the women's basketball team, far away from their husband and father.

"It comes down to a pretty obvious decision for me to go in Louisville and be with my husband so my family can be together," Holt said. "But it didn't make the decision any easier. Sometimes the most obvious decisions are the hardest ones to make."

While the effects of Holt's resignation will reunite her immediate family, she will leave behind the players and the program that she loves.

"I wish I could have brought only three people in the world that I love more than my players are my husband and my two sons. That's really what it came down to," Holt said.

Women's head basketball coach Holt mulled over other options before reaching the decision to leave, such as traveling back and forth from Kentucky to Idaho for the season, but she felt these options were not in the best interest of her family or the future of the UI women's basketball program.

"The No. 1 question that had to be answered was what was best for the University of Idaho women's basketball program. I felt [the options] put the program in the air the past few years. Right now, we're at the point where we're on very solid ground with this program and I hope to help the Vandals make it even more solid.

Holt, a 1997-98 All-American, finished a career with Coconis and held both the head coaching positions at University of Pacific and the University of Nevada in the past.

Over the last four years here at Idaho, Holt has worked more than a successful program, one in which she figures on the brink of the national scene in the near future. She has forged personal relationships with her players and made a difference in their lives.

"I'm losing a coach, but it's also like I'm losing one of my closest friends," said Alli Nieman, a 4-5 sophomore starter for the Vandals.

Even with her intensive coaching background, Holt is not currently pursuing other coaching jobs at the present time.

"Quite honestly, I don't have the heart for another job, because I want to be here," Holt said, fighting back tears. "I want to be with my kids and I want to be with my players. Thinking about getting another job at this point in my career isn't an option for me. I want to be with these players, and if I can't be with them, then I don't want to be with anybody."

Even though Holt would have loved to have been with the program for at least five more years, she is satisfied with the accomplishments she and her coaching staff have made.

"I know one thing — that I can leave feeling like I've done it right, followed the rules and done the right things with these [players] and the program, and I'm proud of that," Holt said.

Holt will leave the school on April 10. A national search for her replacement will begin immediately.

among people being considered for the position is Hillary Beckner, one of the current team's assistant coaches.

Vandal tennis boasts international flavor

Steve Blamer
staff

Auckland and Sydney, Australia.
Mexicali, Mexico. Moscow, Russia.

These cities are not the fascinating destinations on an around-the-world "Tour of Trigs." Bob Barker might give away "The Price is Right," but rather the hometowns of members of the University of Idaho men's tennis team.

Tonya Aldrete hails from Mexicali; Dan Willman from Auckland; Darin Currah from Sydney; and one of the newest members of the team, Andrei Novikov, calls Moscow, Russia home.

Aldrete, a senior, and Willman, a senior, and former doubles partners and veterans of the Vandal tennis team. As partners, they finished the last freshman year with a record of 14-4.

In his first two years as a Vandal, Aldrete has compiled a very respectable 32-13 singles record. Willman also has an impressive record in both singles and doubles competition. Prior to this year, he posted a 42-15 career singles record and a 30-10 doubles record.

Willman and Currah are the Vandals' No. 1 doubles team and are making some noise on the national scene. The Intercollegiate Tennis Association ranks the duo in the top 30.

Aldrete and Willman have both played tennis since an early age, but both took different paths to Idaho.

Aldrete first started playing tennis at age 6. Like most kids who are athletically inclined, he discovered other sports like basketball, and at the age of 14, things came full circle and tennis was back in his life.

"When I was 14 I decided to dedicate myself to tennis," Aldrete said. He would later graduate from high school early and meet Vandal tennis head coach Greg South while in Tucson, Ariz. By January, Aldrete enrolled at the UI with a tennis scholarship.

Willman took a slightly different route to the rolling hills of the Palouse.

Growing up in Australia, Willman was playing rugby by the time he was 4. Four years later, he would pick up tennis, which he would eventually lead him to San Jacinto Junior College in Texas. While at San Jacinto, Willman would talk to coach South and later find himself in Idaho as one of the top doubles players in the country.

Both Aldrete and Willman consider themselves all-around players and describe their game as aggressive.

"Tennis is about 90 percent mental," Aldrete added.

"Part of being mentally tough is being able to control anger while on the court. You can't let yourself get too angry, Willman said. "You have to keep focused the whole time."

This is a difficult task when you consider a match can last anywhere from two to four and a half hours. After a match, both players admit to being physically and mentally exhausted.

Aldrete and Willman are very optimistic about the chances of the Vandal tennis team.

Both feel this year's team is stronger than past Idaho teams, they have the potential to do quite well.

The men's team heads to Boise this weekend to compete in the Air Touch Cellular Classic. They will be competing against the likes of Michigan, Michigan State, and Virginia Tech — all big schools which should be a good measuring stick for the Vandals before heading into the Big West Championships at the end of April.

Agassi: back in the saddle?
Barry Graham

Ever since the rise in popularity of professional men's tennis, more and more fans are turning out for events, be they the small variety or one of the Four Grand Slam tournaments. The undisputed catalyst of this popularity movement has undoubtedly been Las Vegas' own Andre Agassi. Agassi has won three of the four Grand Slam tournaments, with the French Open being the only event that has eluded his strong baseliner. And let's be honest here, the red clay of Roland Garros should be a surface that Agassi should own.

His career accomplishments go beyond winning three of the four Grand Slam tournaments. Agassi has been a part of the United States Davis Cup team, has won several of the ATP Super Nine events, has formally been the No. 1-ranked player in the world and has been the poster boy for Nike and the Canon Eins cameras.

His "sparkling" charisma and candid commentary have endeared him with fans all over the world as well as in the United States. As the popularity of the game has increased with Agassi's presence, so has it declined with his long trips of absence from the sport. The first came about in the early 1990s when Agassi was just a young teen star in the making. He played himself into the finals of the French Open twice but lost two relatively close matches.

Then he took some time off to "re-focus." Surprisingly, he won the only tournament the free world did not think he could win. Wimbledon, on slick grass, where Agassi dominated, winning match after match, and ascending into the top spot in the world rankings.

Then Agassi began to slump a bit and his moody forehead and lethal two-handed backhand failed him. He put on some weight and had a wrist injury that did not allow him to defend his Wimbledon title the next season.

Then in rapid succession, he came back in the mid '90s and won the U.S. Open and then the Australian Open with his fierce game and minus that long hair.

Instead, we saw Agassi with a shaved head and a goatee blowing everyone in his path away. As we heard interviews from the player, he said that he had "re-committed" himself to the sport and would dedicate his life to proving that he was one of the best.

Well, he did for a while, but then Agassi and his second love, Brooke Shields, married, and his career went down the drain. For a while, he put an end to his compile satellite tournaments, which are equivalent to the minor leagues, and was consistently getting dispatched by players ranked in the 500s.

You did not see his face in many commercials and all you heard was how happy Brooke and Andre were. This brings us to today, where, all of a sudden out of nowhere, this shaved headed, bullet firing, goatee wearing blaster has turned on it once again and has won 11 straight matches and the last two events he has participated in.

He has improved his rating from 120 to 40 and continues to down seed after seed with not much abandonment.

Where will it all go? Probably as the No. 1 player again. It is possible that Agami has had his competitive fuse lit once again. But who knows how long?

Regardless of just how successful he actually becomes in his third comeback, fans will follow his story. When he is completely dedicated he is in the top three players in the world.

In light of all this, should garner the type of attention players like Sampras and people like Sampras, critics and writers like myself? If there has ever been a player that has shown the least bit of consistency in his sport, it's Agassi. Then why do people focus on Agassi over the mark of consistency that is Pete Sampras. Everyone knows that Sampras does not have the charisma and outlandish personality of Agassi, but he has been number one for about five years now. Andy Roddick, whom the critics love, and people like Sampras are determined to stay consistent and avoid distractions. Hopefully Andre can avoid this and become a top player and become the player that Sampras is.
