MINES SCHOOL HAS BIG FUTURE

Recent Creation Will Play Large Part in Development of State's Mineral Resources

That Idaho's future as a mining state is just beginning instead of ending is the belief of Dean Thomas and he also believes that the university is destined to be a factor in this development.

"That mining education should be emphasized in the University of Idaho, goes without saying," said the dean. "Some of the premier mining states in the Northwest and one of the large states in the mining production of copper, silver, and zinc, now, the great development of the state with the school of mining, enable it to compete with the other mining states giving better training in mining and metallurgy and geology. Mining, metallurgy, mining engineers, and metallurgists are today helping to solve the economic problems of the economy of the state, and in the future the mining state will be a large part of the world economy."

Dean Thomas emphasizes the need of a strong engineering department for the future development of the state. He believes that the state is in the front rank of the mining states. He expects the new school to give a strong course in a liberal professional education in the mining and metallurgical sciences and in the geology of minerals, to prepare the mining engineers of the state for the future.
