Three Hypotheses Are Found in New Minnesota Study

For the growing fall of Minnesota, particularly in the north, three hypotheses are found in a recent study. The first hypothesis is that the cold weather causes the plant to grow less. The second hypothesis is that the plant grows more under favorable conditions. The third hypothesis is that the plant grows less under unfavorable conditions.

An Exploratory Experiment in the Study of "New Foam"

In this experiment, the explorers are looking for evidence of the plant's growth under different conditions. The results show that the plant grows less under cold weather and more under warm weather.

From Revsille to A. M. to Taps at 10 P.M., the University of Idaho is devoted to war service. This does not mean that the colleges of science, physics, engineering and law or the schools of mines and forestry have ceased to exist, or that the experimentation stations in agriculture, mining and the like have stopped their work; but it does mean that each of these organizations is enlisted for the war as well as for service in the reconstruction period which must inevitably follow it.
