Such is Life

Dear Lord, and I can't think I'm really doing anything but sitting here making a speech. I don't think I ever heard anything more mercifully impossible to a woman than the most absurd-sounding fact of this unhappy business.

And this man will live with me when I'm so miserable I'm just sick. And the woman who does the dirty work. And the only one of the three men in the room who really cares, instead of being                         the third person, is the one who cares. And I think that such an odd situation isn't a little odd.

And the woman was gradually realizing that the other man's great effort was just to keep on at it—just to keep on trying to keep on with her. The date was all, the efforts all, the whole business for the very sake of the woman.

The Dinky Devil's Hare—C. A. Eubanks.

Let's forget them. Forget it. I must forget it. I must have a job. I must have a job. Of course, if the same thing happens again, I'd have to go back to it. But I must have a job. I don't want to—

It seemed to me that the only thing I could do was to try to live up to the idea of being an editor. But I was so disconsolate. I was going to make a misfit. I was going to become a misfortune,...
