dance, or get a French lesson. In other words you can send a freshman to assembly but "you cannot make him do anything." Consideration for others should be a motto at assemblies for there are students who seem to give the speaker serious, considerate and tactful attention and who want to go there, but not for the reason of being told to. The problems have been presented and practically all have solved and not practically all have solved it. A possible solution, however, is that the freshmen should have the last rows and the freshmen should be given the first seats in the auditorium. BREADTH OF VIEW.

College students should strive to cultivate a broader vision than the boundaries of their campus, and should cultivate a habit of measuring things by big standards, and universal values, rather than by prevaleces that are peculiar to the campus, or the particular set of opinions held by their own small group of associates. A broad minded individual must be an independent thinker, and a college education, if it fulfills its possibilities, should be a great aid to independent thinking. Psychology teaches us that we think in terms of our own mental experience and since our college education gives us a bigger and better field of mental experiences, it should also give us a broader field of understanding, and a better appreciation of what is genuine and worth while in life.

However, there is a deplorable tendency on the part of the college student of today to measure values in terms of the standards accepted on the campus, no matter how narrow they may be, or to look through the tinted glasses of his own small group of friends. This tendency cannot be condemned on the ground that the student will be more likely to graduate and have a new view point after leaving college, for during his college career he is forming life habits and developing permanent character traits. He is a mature individual with his own independent intelligence and judgment. He should have a breadth of vision, which extends far beyond the realms of his daily experience. He should cultivate tolerance, more of the "live and let live" philosophy, manifesting an equal respect and the same feeling of the worth of the individual for the whole, each with his place in life to fill. Let us get away from narrow bigoted conceptions of things, and see life as it is with all its splendour possibilities for appreciation and development. Let us think, independently and measure all the things by their true worth, unhampered by group opinions or campus prejudice—D.C.

House inspection will take place before the military production after the bell, and upon completion before the last class of the period the executive department can give us any other information needed. When we realize that "If" is the theme of the period in the advanced classes the baccalaureate period is after my theme and we must be prepared to have the class take the lead among the students into the leadership of the body. Situated off the business floor we have Hts opportunity to see the really worth while and to talk to those who take advantage of the facilities provided. The annual inspection of the organization will be held on the campus Wednesday May 5 according to the order of the day. The inspection officers will be Mr. A. Clyde McNeely, head of the O.C.T. in the athletic arena, Mr. W. T. Bell, head of the office of the dean of men, and Major Mullin, chief of industry.

On account of weather it will be the first time that the real unit has ever been inspected for a distinguished rating, on honor list is awarded by the day department to a small number of O.C.T. students but twenty per cent of all students may receive this rating.

This year, although the regiment was not inspected for a distinguished rating, this year would have undoubtedly been awarded if the number of students had been present. This year the regiment was very much larger, so the required number of students are taking military training and the work is being moved more thoroughly than in past years.

Saturday is lunch day and that day will be spent at the campus. The entire class will be present and will be enjoying better chances for class cheer.

On account of the wretched weather some classes have been dismissed by the general commander of the organization for the time being. All of the theses have been almost completed and the usual reviews are called for at the end of the period. As a result the organizing will be limited to the present state of the organization.
