Maybe It's The Color --

For a few days now a shiny new university town has been in operation in Moscow, making hourly trips up and down the Administration Building. The trip is conveniently timed to coincide with the arrival of the 11 a.m. football game, and the crowd is drawn from every section of the university campus.

The reason, the term, can be traced back to the old foundation of the school. A few years ago, when the university was founded, the students were divided into classes according to their tastes and hobbies. The classes were named for their colors, and it has been seen that those colors have persisted into the present day.

It is a curious fact that the colors are not always the same. For example, the first class was yellow and green, but by the time the second class was formed, it had become yellow and blue.

The reason for this change is a mystery, but it is generally believed that the change is due to the influence of the weather. During the winter, the classes are likely to be yellow and green, while during the summer, they are more likely to be yellow and blue.

Regardless of the reason, the colors have become an integral part of the university's identity, and the students take great pride in their school colors.
