Chemists Make Experiments Valuable
In Solving Practical Problems
Nine Majors in Two Fields Carry on Scientific Research

By Dr. Leo Burris

Nine chemistry and chemical engineering students at the Illinois Institute of Technology are keeping their findings from classroom work in the experimental laboratories of four major industrial companies, under the guidance of Dr. L. C. C. Coffin.

At a gathering held every week, experimental work is discussed and research problems defined that may be needed during the student's first year. Working with W. H. MacFarlane, professor in organic chemistry, they are concentrating on the isolation of natural products, and their potential application toward the discovery of new drugs.

The students use 1000 donations of materials, equipment and salaries to measure relative yields of products in the two fields. The students are: Aziza Ahmed, Masood Bhutto, Emily Epstein, Pauline M. Fink, Steve Gavino, Martin Gruenberg, John H. Hall, Douglas Link, and Steven M. Wolf.

The students are beginning to do work on a synthetic method for the preparation of a new type of drug that could be used in the treatment of cancer.

Defense Drills Mark Vandal Practice

Seeking their first conference victory of the season, Idaho's Vandals will try again tomorrow night at Pullman when they meet Washington State in the third clash of their four-game series. The Friuli, which is in the series with a couple of decisive victories.

In the past, the Vandals have murdered the Rivalry Drills this week. It is not to be taken lightly, both off the court and defense totally rested. By virtue of the season's start, a breakdown in the Vandals' defense has been noticed. The team's defense will be put to the test as the Vandals will face the Fordham Rams on Friday and Saturday night's games.

Defensive drills have been the focus of the Vandals' practice, according to head coach Mike D'Antoni, who noted that his team has been working on improving its defense.

"We're trying to put our best foot forward in terms of defense," D'Antoni said. "We want to be able to stop the other team and force turnovers."
