Small Crowd Enjoys First ASU Play

Before a scattered audience last night, Alden Cleaver literally "put the play in her pocket" as the first ASU play of the year. The audience was a small, friendly, odd-sized group, badly surrounded by the empty seats. Yet, Alden's inspired sympathy and feeling for the characters were successfully transmitted to the audience in a way few others might have done.

In the midst of the audience, one could find a fellow who seemed to enjoy the play. In the back, near the stage, a young man sat absolutely still, watching the performance with interest. He was one of the few who seemed to have come for the performance. Most of the audience were just passing through, curious about the play. A few were sitting alone, lost in thought. Others were chatting with each other, perhaps about the play or something else entirely.

The production deserved much better audience than it had last night. Maybe the audience doesn't know that this is a good play. But even if it doesn't, I believe that if they see it again, they will enjoy it.

Alden Cleaver, head of the number two business school, has a future in the theater. She has been a part of several productions in the past, and her talent has been recognized by many. She has a natural talent for acting, and her performance last night was a testament to her skills.

Examiners Show Originality in Election Board Quiz

The quiz, presented to the examiners by the board, was an excellent way to test their knowledge of the election laws. The questions were challenging, but the examiners were able to demonstrate their understanding of the laws by answering them correctly.

One of the questions was: "What is the definition of a ballot?" The examiners were able to provide a clear and concise definition, which was correct.

Another question was: "What is the purpose of a poll watch?" The examiners were able to explain the purpose of poll watching, which is to ensure that the election process is fair and free of fraud.

Rules Disparity - Loan Debtor

A loan debtor, who had outstanding debts on several loans, was unable to pay them back. The examiners were able to show that the debtor was not in violation of the law by providing evidence that he had made attempts to pay back the loans.
