Empty Bottles, Empty Heads

At nearly every college football game we have ever been to, we have noticed the same thing: when the game comes to a close, we are always left with empty bottles and empty heads. These phenomena are not unique to college football games, but they seem to be related. Students have been known to consume large amounts of alcohol in a short amount of time, often leading to rubber bandiness and a general feeling of being drunk. This is because the body can only process alcohol at a certain rate, and when the rate of consumption exceeds the body's ability to process it, the alcohol builds up in the bloodstream, leading to a state of intoxication.

A recent study conducted by the Department of Health and Human Services found that college students consume an average of 1.5 liters of alcohol per week, which translates to approximately 230 units per year. This is significantly higher than the recommended daily intake of alcohol by the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, which is 14 units per week for men and 7 units per week for women.

The study also found that the majority of college students who drink heavily are not aware of the risks associated with heavy drinking. Many believe that they are able to function normally while under the influence of alcohol, but this is not true. Heavy drinking can lead to a variety of health problems, including liver damage, heart disease, and stroke.

In addition to the health risks, heavy drinking also has a significant impact on academic performance. A study published in the Journal of Studies on Alcohol and Drugs found that students who drink heavily are more likely to miss class, have lower grades, and have a higher likelihood of dropping out of college.

So, the next time you find yourself at a college football game, remember to drink responsibly and enjoy the game without sacrificing your health.

Vandals Ready Their Most Unusual Attack

By ALLAN DEERING

Tuesday evening a group of three local residents, including George Petrie, revealed their plan to destroy the school's football field. Their method involved a technique that has never been attempted before.

The plan was to fill the grass with water, thus making it impossible for the team to play. The water was to be introduced through a series of small holes dug into the ground, each one acting as a mini-sprinkler.

Petrie explained that the idea came to him after observing the damage caused by heavy rains on the field during the previous season. He believed that by creating a permanent water system, the team could be effectively prevented from using the field.

Despite the unusual nature of the plan, the residents are determined to see it through. They have already started digging the holes and expect to have the field ready for the first game of the season.

Vandals' Attack on the Field

With the field now thoroughly watered, the Vandals are confident that their plan will work. They have even prepared a sign to be put up on the field, warning local residents not to use it.

The residents are not concerned about the potential damage to the lawn, as they believe it will be covered with artificial turf once the season is over.

Spalding Sports Show

George Petrie, who is the organizer of the Spalding Sports Show, announced that the event will take place on Saturday, September 25, at the school auditorium.

The show will feature a variety of sports demonstrations, including basketball, football, and soccer. Local players will also participate in a friendly match, which will be broadcast live on television.

Guests for the show include former professional athletes and coaches, who will share their experiences and offer tips for improvement.

The proceeds from the show will be donated to the school's athletics department, to help fund future events and ensure the continued growth of sports programs.

The show is expected to attract a large audience, with tickets available for purchase at the door. For more information, please visit the school's website or contact George Petrie directly.
