US Students Lack Curiosity

Foreign students may be well familiar with the idiosyncrasies of their home countries. The American student, on the other hand, is frequently surprised with the lack of curiosity some of his foreign classmates display toward American life.

Within a small university of American students, there is general interest in learning about the lives of the students from foreign countries. This interest is encouraged, and through discussions of this nature, students learn more about other countries and cultures.

The students live in dormitories, co-ed, with an occasional question or two about customs and culture. Admitting the students in this manner makes it possible for them to know more about the life of the other Americans.

If more of us at the student level took more interest in the lives of our classmates and nations we might be in the position of knowing the top of the long staircase of world peace.

Five of Parberry's nine pitchers for the season had not appeared in the green tux since that time. All played well, in fact, in the biggest game of the season.
