An Argument Is Tropically Disproved

The main reason why University of Idaho students have to leave the state, says Dr. Charles K. Loyd of the Department of English at Idaho, is not the climate, but the Idaho community itself. "Most people think the climate is the reason so many students leave Idaho," he says. "But this year, in fact, the climate has been unusually mild. What's really wrong is the whole concept of the Idaho community as a viable place for higher education."

Time For Decision

It's time the people of our state make up their minds on the status of higher education in Idaho.

State Sen. Elrod Bierley of Butte, chairman of the legislative budget committee, summarized the lesson. He listened to Idaho educational institutions present their budget needs and then decided whether the state should appropriate funds to meet them.

Senior Vice President of the Panhandle Intercollegiate, standing at the committee's door, was told to "make or break" (as the Idaho Press-Telegram phrased it) in terms of achieving budgetary status. But it can be said that legislative building will be a major factor in determining educational status. For it is in the hands of the representatives, through their votes, to decide the fate of Idaho's education system.

High School Students On Campus

When Idaho and Washington high schools will participate in the state's first athletic meets is still in doubt. The Idaho fall state athletic tournament, scheduled for next week, is still not set.

Dr. J. E. P. Wilder, chairman of the state athletic association, said, "The weather in eastern Idaho is too uncertain to be sure."
