Students are a very valuable resource tool for gaining information. Rep. John Palmer recently said what he envisions the student body as they have encouraged the Joint Finance Appropriations Committee of the legislature to allow students to participate in the budget hearings on higher education. His suggestion was approved.

A new addition to student participation in the budget hearings is the student budget hearing plan. Students will come to Boise accompanied by a member of their faculty or administrator who would brief the students on the various programs and how the Senate works.

Today's young adults in institutions of higher learning have many more things than ever before into the workforce, their needs, the failure and successes of higher education.

Students on a state level have found themselves engaged and surrounded by the educational process both in and around the classrooms. And in the case of the University of Idaho, students are older and more mature. President Phinney reported last November that between 80 to 90 percent of the students enrolled at Idaho are 21 years of age or older. Rep. Palmer expressed the top-priority budget committee that he feels the college students of today know a whole lot more and have greater access to up-to-date information than the older generation gives them credit for. His plan is an attempt to bridge two gaping chasms, one of which is the present community's inability to obtain information and reach the students. These events are made available to students with their appropriate laws. The second chasm is the environment for the comparatively generous gap which probably makes the attitude toward the students his "old hat" attitude toward the plan.

According to a United Press International report three weeks ago, Rep. Palmer approached the state board of education with the proposal, but that "the board felt the students might return to their campuses and say the wrong thing.

Both Rep. Palmer and Sen. Richard High, R-Twin Falls, have said that this feels that students should not be concerned after the hearing. "They should be perfectly free to go home and say what they like," said Mr. High. "We want someone who is a vital local and who would tell it like it is.

It is a complete indication that the legislature is interested both in what students are thinking and the approach students have to education. A good connection after a time, recognizing students as young adults, and potential leaders of tomorrow has been put forward by these legislation.

Where's the S O B ?

In the recent printed Campus Director some discrepancies have been printed out. A tabulation of the officials of the Associated Students of the University of Idaho shows each name, position and where each has his office.

But "S O B" is listed behind three of the names. Senate Office Building, administration, supplies the solution to the initial, but those are not aware of the question.

While most Idaho students have been enjoying the holidays of a long Christmas vacation, the Vandals basketball team has been working hard on a good snow with a winning streak of five straight games.

It appears that no team in the Vandals' history has won more consecutive games on the road.

They closed the holiday season with two home-water victories over Whitworth College, 90-86, and Seattle Pacific, 88-87. With those victories, they under their belts, the Vandals concluded the season and are now ready to start the fourth victory of their new term, starting at the Idaho in the first game of the season Monday night.

Mike Fringer and Larry Connors, who completed their eligibility the leading Vander scorer, Malcolm Taylor, will be a key and with his team's running the clock to the Vandals' basketball victory.

Game with SPU

A strong team effort was evident in the win over Whitworth.

Malcolm Taylor was high point man with 20 points while Gary Ketcher and John Hellis both added 12 points each. Scott Ryan and Mike Smith were also key men in the effort. The Vandals made 11 of 21 three-point attempts.

Taylor was at the floor near the end of the game in a key moment of the game. The Vandals needed a shot to tie the game at 86-86 but Taylor was not able to make the shot.

Asst. Coach John Smith starts seventh year here

John Smith is in his seventh year as an assistant basketball coach and head coach for the Vandals. Four years ago he was named assistant basketball coach for Crane-Anderson and head basketball coach.

Coach Howard Smith has a wealth of basketball talent and a good background for coaching the Vandals, graduating in 1983 from Idaho State University at Pocatello and entering the coaching ranks as a graduate assistant at Central State University in Pocatello. He was named head coach at Idaho State University four years ago to a deal that had to be done. Following his high school coaching career, he coached basketball coach at Central State University and add basketball coach at Central State University.

He was still young and hungry at the time. He was coaching basketball at the time and was a young coach at 26 years old.

Smith has been in control for the next four years and has taken the Vandals to the next level.

Assistant Features Editor

Steak Lovers, beware your Valentine's Day at the University. Your furry or feathered friends won't be able to sit in the SUB, Student Union Building, during the Valentine's Day celebration February 14. The decision to ban pets is aimed at creating a better environment for the University community, according to university spokespersons.

"The University tries to be as inclusive as possible," said停.
