In the Spirit

It was a little after 6:30 Monday morning when the pickup truck turned off the parkway and rolled down the road toward town. With red brake lights glowing, it jerked to a stop in the asphalt surrounded by trees, and out of curiosity a dozen sleepy heads bobbed up from hibernation in the underbrush. The driver and his wooly passenger got out of the vehicle, unfurled a couple of giant plastic bags and slowly began to collect the debris scattered around the University of Idaho campus, leftovers from the Blue Mountain Rock Festival the day before.

Eventually, all the overnights camped around their defended tents woke up to the disruption and joined in the efforts to gather garbage and glass and clear the grounds. The two strangers finally rummied away up the hill with a full pickup load, leaving only because they had to get to their daytime jobs. And the post-festival workers kept it all, later aided by reinforcements who came expressly to clean up the left behind by all the far-out people when bands broke up the previous night. Totaling nearly 30 in all, the festival finishers gathered every scrap of styrofoam and broken bottles, all the boxes, scraps of food, and sundry concert remnants and they left the University's green park in a cleaner condition than before the bonfire descended Sunday.

And this final act—the most distasteful task of all—illustrated the spirit of Blue Mountain. Though penetrated by many foreigners and aging mountain people trying to recapture their Fanstep years, it was still a pure sunshine experience, the best day of the year. It began, with a Saturday full of activities, crafts and warm-up music, and it resulted in good feelings right up to the hassle-free midnight closing when Moscow officials finally moved in to stop the party. And then the spirit carried on! I recall the rusted Monday to inspire the huge clean-up efforts by a handful of hard-working people.

This kind of spirit could be borne out everywhere—in the Arboretum crowds, among the Moscow townpeople, with the honest posture found in conventional parts of this state—S.A.U.!

In Support of Jocks

The means is the perfect place to fall back, hide of meditation depths and experiences, and slice the world’s most powerful problems. They belong to us, and we are the only ones who can make them our own.

It is the time of St. Valentine's Day. The day may or may not be celebrated in our schools, but it has always been welcomed by our students. There are few days in the year that can be celebrated by all students, no matter what their sex or age. The day is a time for expressing love and for sharing with others.

The day is coming to a close, and the students are scattered throughout the campus. They are enjoying the day, and they are enjoying each other.

The campus is the perfect place to fall back, hide of meditation depths and experiences, and slice the world’s most powerful problems. They belong to us, and we are the only ones who can make them our own.

There is no doubt that some students do not celebrate Valentine's Day, but they have probably found other ways to express their love and affection for their significant others. Valentine's Day is a day of love, and it should be celebrated by all students.

To the Editor: "What is the impact of a rock concert, our race or any other generator of large concentrations of people on the environment?"

Many students have voiced concerns about the impact of rock concerts, but little has been done to address these concerns. The impact of a rock concert is multifaceted, and it can have both positive and negative effects on the environment.

It is important to consider the environmental impact of rock concerts. The use of electricity for lighting and sound production can lead to increased carbon emissions. Additionally, the construction of temporary roads and facilities for the concert can also impact the environment.

On the other hand, rock concerts can have a positive impact on the environment. The use of solar panels and other renewable energy sources can reduce the carbon emissions associated with the event. Additionally, the temporary roads and facilities can be dismantled after the event and reused elsewhere.

In conclusion, the impact of a rock concert on the environment is complex and multifaceted. It is important to consider both the positive and negative effects when planning future events.

Hang In There

To the Editor: "We were all disappointed when the University decided to move the Annual Concert to the winter months. Many students who had planned to attend the event were upset."

However, the decision to move the event was made to accommodate the needs of the university and its students. By moving the concert to the winter months, the university was able to provide a more enjoyable experience for the attendees.

The move also allowed the university to save money by reducing the cost of renting the venue and providing security.

In conclusion, while the move may have been disappointing for some students, it was necessary to make the best decision for the university and its students.
