A brief summary of the most important conclusions of the study follows:

1. The observed growth of the number of fraternities, chapters, and members was not as great as anticipated. This was due to several factors, including the decrease in the number of freshmen and sophomores opting to join fraternities.
2. The overall growth of the fraternity system was slower than expected, with a significant drop in the number of new members joining in the fall of 1963.
3. The retention rates for fraternity members were lower than anticipated, with many members leaving the fraternity system before the end of their college careers.
4. The financial stability of the fraternity system was more precarious than anticipated, with many fraternities facing financial difficulties.
5. The social integration of fraternity members was not as widespread as anticipated, with many fraternity members remaining isolated from the rest of the campus community.

For a more detailed analysis of the fraternity system and its implications, please refer to the full report.
