Student Interest In Crime

"College newspapers throughout the United States have reflected crimes of student journalism. The editors of the college press have a reading audience for the young clientele, a fixed and steady circulation which does not require the playing of up to numbers, readerships, kidnappings or bylines for reader interest."

But the recent crime wave in the United States which has been emphasized by the San Jose kidnaping of Brooke Hart several months ago and the present Dillinger case has become more than a principle of college journalism ethics. They symbolize a condition in American life which the present college generation will have to cope with and face within a very short time.

Attorney-General Homer S. Cummings has estimated that there are twice as many armed criminals in the United States as at the present time than the combined men in the army, navy, and marine corps. Edmund S. Paxton, writing for the preface of Vanity Fair says: "Mystery has long been one of our national sports. Recently it has become a national industry."

"We could wipe this disease out in two or three months if we really cared to do so."

"The death penalty—its mere existence on the books, but its use would discourage further Dillingers."

What can the present college generation do about the crime situation in the United States? They will be forced to make up their minds in a few years. Will they treat it with the same sentimentality characteristic of the Dillinger case? Will they treat it with absolute disrespect for law as in the case of the San Jose lynching? Or will they work out a sane penal code that will correct the existing conditions of the moment—"California Brain."
