Foresters Outdo Andrews By Capturing Monstrousities

The pre-historic animals discovered by Roy Chapman Andrews in the Gobi Desert of Mongolia are not the only animals which have been brought to the fore in the past year. The discovery of the new species of dinosaurs has been paralleled by the discovery of a new species of forest beast. These new animals are not unlike the famous Saber-toothed Tigers, but they are much larger and more dangerous. They are said to have been discovered in the Siberian forests, where they are thought to be the ancestors of the modern forest beasts.

The forest beasts, which are about ten feet long and three feet high at the shoulders, are said to be able to leap ten feet into the air and to travel at speeds of up to sixty miles per hour. They are extremely strong and are able to carry heavy loads, such as trees, rocks, and other objects.

The discovery of these animals has created a great deal of interest among scientists and the general public. It is believed that the forest beasts could be used in the future for transportation and as a source of power.

The forest beasts are not the only new species of animals discovered in recent years. The discovery of the new species of dinosaurs, the pre-historic animals, and the forest beasts are all part of the great revolution in science and technology that is taking place today. It is believed that these new species of animals will play an important role in the future of science and technology.
