Program in trouble because of success

University tutoring and learning problems program faces hard times because of high usage

One of the university's most popular and well-utilized services is rumored to be on the brink of ending. Because of increases in the numbers of students using the services, the Learning Resource Center, the facility's primary tutoring program, has been changed; if the center's tutorial workload continues at the current rate, even those changes may not be enough to forestall continual cutbacks to the tutoring program.

L.R.C. Director Judy Walls attributed the funding problems to untold numbers of student need. "We've just been too successful this year in our tutoring programs," she said.

Terry Armstrong, assistant to UI President Richard Gibb, concurred with Walls' assessment. "Judy and her staff have been remarkably successful," he said. "One can never predict usage."

The tutoring program, initiated and funded by the ASUL, was set up to provide one hour's important instruction in which a student was experiencing problems. What happened, according to Walls, was a tremendous increase in the number of students seeking tutoring. This increase was not expected, according to Walls, especially since the program in previous years had not spent its allocation.

When the ASUL tutoring program was merged with the L.R.C.'s programs this year, the first noticeable increases in chart began. As a result, the L.R.C. used most of its ASUL appropriation for the school year midway through the fall semester. An initial allocation of $34,000 was supplemented by an additional $30,000 from UI's emergency reserve. Walls said she had hoped the additional $30,000 would be enough to tutor the program through the end of the spring semester; that was not to be the case, however, and Walls said the ASUL tutoring program had been changed; he said the program was dwindling.

At that point, Walls said, the UI administration came to the center's rescue, with an emergency allocation.

"That amount would have seen us through the year," Walls said. "If tutoring demand had held steady, however, by the end of the semester we were tutoring as many students as we had at the end of fall semester."

"It is most appropriate," said Walls. "We asked UI's R.C. for a key reason the Center's tutoring program was successful is that "students are treated with sensitivity and compassion," both by the staff and student tutors. He said the tutoring program is conducted in a way that is conducive to learning.

Walls stressed that none of the other programs of the Center, including the tutoring funding shortfall. Reading, writing and study skills programs funded by the Office of Student Advising Services were not cut.

Walls said, "The tutoring program funded by the Special Services Office. "Because only budget in danger is that funded by ASUL." said Walls.

One tangible result of the funding situation is that the Center has made significant changes in the tutoring programs initiated budgeted by ASUL. We are arranging group tutoring wherever possible," said Edger Director. "We are also limiting how much tutoring each student can receive. We will tutor individuals at one hour a week, period."

In addition, Walls said, students who need help with mathematics, accounting and economics courses are being asked to visit labs maintained by those departments. "We have functioned as a back-up to the labs all year, offering highly individualized help in these three fields," Walls said. "The staff labs often have to work with groups of people; their student load is always heavy, and we have been happy to lighten it."

Walls expressed disappointment at the loss of funding for tutors, but said she has no idea what the future holds for the tutoring program. "I don't anticipate ten minutes from now," she said.

While Walls expressed gratitude to the university administration for establishing new and innovative sources of funding for the tutoring program, she also expressed concern about the possibility that all the funding for the future may be lost.

"We all agree the tutoring program needs a new funding source," she said. The administration and ASUL bailouts, she said, are "a clear and obvious proof that they believe in what we're doing." She said the administration and ASUL are currently exploring new funding sources in the future. "We are interested in a funding base that will be fair to all students and meet their needs for tutoring."

Senate dislikes '21, Arg comics

The Idaho Legislature should resist the federal legislation to impose a nationwide minimum legal drinking age of 21. The ASUL Senate stated in a resolution that was passed on Wednesday.

In the resolution, the Senate encourages the Legislature to refrain from acting on that legislation until after pending legal actions are decided. Legal action has been taken by the state governments of South Dakota and Wyoming, which are suing the federal government. If the drinking age legislation, Idaho recently joined that suit.

The ASUL Senate passed the resolution unanimously. A copy will be sent to the ASUL lobbyists in Boise to use at their discretion.

The resolution, written by Sen. Ben Richard Kuck, is similar to two others, also written by Kuck, that were rejected by the Senate at earlier meetings. The first drinking age resolution was voted down by the senate last spring. As a result, some members said the drinking age should not be one of the Senate's priorities.

The second resolution was written away by Kuck after senators requested more time to consider it. Kuck said at that meeting that immediate action was necessary.

As it turned out, the drinking age is still under consideration in the Idaho Senate. Kuck urged the ASUL Senate to pass the resolution Wednesday. He had slightly changed it, deleting sections that referred to the survey of UI students in which the majority wanted the Legislature to reject the federal legislation. Some senators said the survey of 200 students was not a statistically representative sample of all UI students.

At Wednesday's meeting, Kuck told senators that some important issues should be passed regarding the drinking age. "It's an important issue. It's a matter of concern," the resolution stated.

Sen. John Vanderpool agreed. "I think the students should want to see that position on this," he said.

In their "communications," the resolution stated thesenators would meet tomorrow to discuss and report on content of the student newspaper.

Vanderpool said students have complained about the "tastelessness" of some of the paper's published work. "They also want the paper to cover more events," he said. "If some don't feel the Argonaut is all that useful," he said.

Sen. Chris Berg said a lot of of students' comments are "dissapointed" with the paper, especially the Brain Tumors cartoon by Brian Tuomey and Michelle Tuomey.

"It's stupid," Berg said. "It's nonsense. I have a good sense of humor, and I don't find it funny."

Gary Lindberg, president pro tem of the Senate, said he thought the cartoon in the Feb. 19 issue was "quite morbid." Walls, who has been known to "refrain from blood," said it was "Fred's last night as the Argonaut cartoon." It depicted a man dancing with a corpse in a morgue, as police officers enter the room.

Lindberg said Michael Munitl, who used to draw the cartoon for the Argonaut, would be willing to come back and draw the strip "under certain terms." Lindberg said he thought any price Munitl charged would be worthwhile if the paper could get rid of Brain Tumors.

ASUL Vice President Mike Todd told the senators to encourage students to write letters to the editor of the Argonaut if they have complaints. He said the ASUL does not want to censor the paper, but said he expects "better of the student newspaper."

Trail also told the senators one of the people associated with Brain Tumors, McIntosh, is attending the Columbia Pacific Press Association convention with Argonaut editor Lewis Day even though McIntosh is not a journalist. "If you are a journalist major, you should be able to make those decisions," he said.

"We did our best to design a system that's workable, but it's not perfect, and it probably has flaws in it, but, we'll deal with that," Eder said.

The system itself consists of a series of simple steps for the registering student to follow. The steps are:

First, file a "Permit to Register" card with the registrar's office prior to May 31. The permit to register form will be available in your Dean's office.

The second step is to meet with your advisor, pick your courses and get either your major professor's signature or a Dean's signature.

Thirdly, go to the registrar's office and pay a $25 deposit. Next, file the completed form with the Registrar's office.

Along with this form of registration, others will be provided. A mail-in registration will be available to those who are not in the area at the time of the early registration period. A new streamlined form of registration similar to the student government and administration's on-line registration form will be offered the day before the campus opens.

The new program will greatly affect all students and will be a great improvement over the previous system.

Tenants rights discussed

Students who are planning to move off-campus and those who already live there will have a chance to learn about their rights in a Tenant's Rights meeting on Tuesday, February 26.

The discussion, presented by Delta Theta Phi and the UI Law School, will be held in the Gold Room at the UI SUB at 7:30 p.m.

Speakers include Mike Himman, a lawyer with the Idaho Legal Aid office in Lewiston, Lee Squire and Mike Larsen, senator law students in the UI law school clinic specializing in tenant problems.

Squire will speak on mobile homes and how they have different standards than regular housing. Larsen will speak about the small claims court.

Security deposits, cleaning fees, sub-leasing, repairs, withheld rent and heating will be among the different areas covered.

The three hope to cover what rights a tenant has in the Moscow area, said Jim Hansen, seminar chairman.

"The meeting is so that people will know what they are getting into; you can bet the landlords know, but the tenants often don't," he added.

Each speaker will give a short presentation, but the majority of the meeting will be a question and answer period for the students.

This is the second seminar given by the law students. Last year's was on the topic of DUS.

"We hope to have a seminar each year," Hansen said. "It is required for the attorneys to inform the public whenever an opportunity presents itself," he said.

A team of veterinarians and an instrument maker have joined forces at Washington State University to develop an artificial leg for a French racehorse whose career on the track was ended by an injury.

Boitron, a nine-year-old stallion, will never race again. But if the stainless steel prostheses developed here can successfully replace his amputated leg, the dark brown thoroughbred will be returned to stud by the California syndicate that owns him.

Bred in France, Boitron did most of his racing there. He was being shipped to Chicago for a race with the John Henry when he sustained an injury to the bone of his foot. A severe infection developed and the animal lost his right hind hoof. Last June, Dr. Barry Grant, head of the Equine Section of WSU's Veterinary Clinic, was contacted.

Grant is known to the nation's thoroughbred racing community for the pioneering orthopedic surgical techniques he developed which have sent several "wobblers" back to the track.

"We were asked to take a look at him and see whether there was anything we could do," Grant said. "We had to do some additional surgery, and I must say I was not encouraged at first." The horse took the surgery well, he said. He got up right after surgery and started eating.

Grant and a team of 17-18 veterinary professionals and senior students go together with Gary Held, and instrument maker in the mechanical engineering shops in Pullman. They tried several different "legs" with flexible joints, but these proved to be "too movable."

Held then designed a more solid prosthes that includes a "cup" that fits over the stump of Boitron's leg and is held in place with eight standard stitches. Extending down from the bottom of the cup to a hinged foot plate are two stainless steel support tubes.

Behind the support tubes and mounted directly to the foot plate and support cup is a shock absorber from the steering component of a motorcycle.

The horse is now able to lie down and get up, something he could not do comfortably with the first one, said Grant.

Grant and his staff are exercising Boitron regularly to build up the muscles in the horse's rear end. If all goes well, Boitron could be returned to stud early in February.

Enrollment decline causes budget cuts

The accounts of the ASUI government, radio station and lecture notes service will be cut to help cover the ASUI's $15,000 budget shortfall if ASUI President Jane Freund's proposal is approved by the senate.

Freund's proposal was presented to the senate Wednesday. The shortfall occurred because fewer students enrolled this semester, Freund said.

According to Freund's proposal, the president's account would be cut by $1,500, the senate's account would be cut by $801 and the attorney general's account would be cut by $853.

In addition, student radio station KUOI's account would be cut by $1,300 and Lecture Notes' account would be cut by $5,787.

An additional $4,815 would be taken from the general reserve. Freund said the Lecture Notes cuts were based on the fact that the department was budgeted to provide notes for 20 classes each semester this year but has had less than 20 classes. As a result, there is extra money in the budget.

The KUOI cut was based on the budget appropriation for a teletype service. However, Chan Davis, station manager, said most of that money has been spent. The station did not use the money for a teletype service, but received senate approval last semester to use it to cover other expenses, she said.

The proposal will be studied by the senate finance committee before action is taken.

Ghosts of Mardi Gras(t)
Ebersole Gaines

My concept of Mardi Gras is always changing, but as far as religious elements go, the only ash that will be placed on my forehead will be from the cigarette some punk queen sticks me with on the dance floor at the Beaux Arts Ball. I like the exotism in the parades and the party — territory where Moscow is really starting to come through with the necessary ingredients. Finally!

My first Mardi Gras was down in New Orleans about three years ago. I was working offshore in the Gulf and was constantly pissing in and out of all those small, little ocean towns like Catashias, Thibodaux and Houma. What a different world down there. The music and the food carries a much more prevalent role. Besides becoming addicted to raw oysters and boiled crawfish, I developed a fascination for the Cajun/Creole style of music which is some of the happiest, funk-bop-oo-oo-wye-wop-wop-I've ever twisted in the dust to.

The final day of Mardi Gras I spent with friends in New Orleans. After spending the night in the French Quarter Avenue we jumped on the rear end of a float entered in the parade. As we made towards the center of the city the crowds multiplied and slowed in the same section the parade was moving in order to catch the activities on Canal Street and in the French Quarter.

The intensity of wildness got higher and higher the closer to the city we moved. The crowds of people would struggle with police to get as close as they could to the floats from which beaded necklaces were tossed.

When the floats — along with a good number of explosive marching bands, which roughly made up a five mile long parade — reached Canal Street, the chase started. It was the largest assembly of human bodies I've ever seen in my life. As far as you could see down New Orleans' main vein there was nothing but the visible tops of floats swimming in a sea of heads and shoulders. Police no longer had any influence whatsoever, so they more or less pulled out. Several of us ascended the last rows of the last float and watched from the upper panes for thousands when it is hard to move around in a normal parade. The edges of the floats were twisted in all its artistry, musicians in weird sex shows.

This is where the real color and weirdness the celebration is famous for appeared. The sea of heads and shoulders continued in here but had grown even thicker by this time. People were packing balconies which hung out over the narrow streets where hundreds of bars opened so that many could fight their way in and out. One balcony, I remember, displayed a woman stripper teasing a large audience on the street below. Frankly shouting suggestive words at her. I seem to have seen a tendril of such spectacle and remembered this being tagged off by my friend long before I was ready to venture to these depths to see the crowd.

Music was being performed everywhere. Musicians would gather on a corner and play as young tap dancers would join in to the great show.

The costumes people wore seemed to all follow the same theme only — weirdness. Some costumes showed hours of work in wear and were incredibly bizarre and clever. New Orleans is definitely the appropriate city for such an extravaganza with its combined old French architecture, warm weather and year long party attitude. It was hosting the largest get down and dirty costume party in the world. It was the ultimate party.

Insanity, toads and winter
Paul Baier

I think the spirit of Mardi Gras could best be summed up by the actions of a friend of mine last year.

This guy spent hours scrunching up under a giant paper toad who was sitting in a hot tub drinking a Margarita.

Now I know the guy is crazy, and I would have understood if he would have been sitting in a hot tub drinking a Margarita with a raped. He's probably done that lots of times.

But there he was pushing this float down the main street of Moscow, peering through a little slit while his friends watched him from the warmth of a local watering hole.

If you ask me, that's a little nuts. Not the part about the warm watering hole, that's only common sense on a February day. But the part about pushing a big toad in a parade makes me wonder.

What about those belly dancers who turned from white to easy red as the wind died but failed to slow down their gyrations.

We wanted to slow down their gyrations too, but they wouldn't come into the warm watering hole.

I used to think that maybe it was a rebellion against the long gray winters we get in these parts, but I'm not so sure anymore.

Winter may have something to do with it, but I think it goes beyond that to something hidden deep within us all.

I guess the best way to describe it would be insanity, but it's cases like mine that's probably going to far. It may be a little nuts to watch a morning parade from a bar, but it's complete insanity to push paper toads and bare your belly on the Palouse in February.

Why do so many people seem to enjoy it then? Even that conservative publication the University of Idaho Argonaut, run by people who live in the upper towers of the SUB and sometimes have very little contact with the outside world, had a float last year complete with dancing girls.

What is this madness? Even the law students got into the act with their briefcase drill team. Now you know exciting lawyers are, so what got into these guys?

Anyone passing through town might think that someone slipped a few hundred hits of something into the town water supply, especially if they saw the Beaux Arts Beauties (my friend scrunches up under a big toad).

I guess you could say that all this madness was due to the fact that the whole event helps out the UI galleries, but it goes beyond that.

Insanity aside, the name of the game is fun, and your money can help out a worthy cause, all the better.

Even if the only cause you've got in mind to help is your freeze-dried brain, at least get out there and join in the event that more than any other brings the community and university more in touch with each other.

So get out there and cheer on the participants even if the weather decides not to cooperate.

I'll be cheering louder than anyone, but of course you have to when your voice has to carry through a plate glass window.

Mardi Gras history shows color

By Kristi Nelson
Staff Writer

The traditional colors, mild weather – the sheer magnitude – of the New Orleans Mardi Gras may be missing, but Moscow's black and gold color scheme, wintry weather, and university involvement make its Mardi Gras celebration unique.

Originating in a Roman custom of merrymaking before a fast period — merrymaking that often included public orgies — Mardi Gras spread throughout Western Europe and evolved into a long carnival season that culminates on the eve of Ash Wednesday, the beginning of Lent.

Today Mardi Gras is celebrated in many Mediterranean countries, particularly on the French and Italian Rivieras; famous Carnival celebrations are also held in Venice and Rio de Janeiro. Traditionally the Mardi Gras, or carnival, as it is sometimes called, begins on Twelfth Night, the sixth of January. Balls and parades are held through Fat Tuesday, but the most frenzied activities begin one week before this Mardi Gras Day.

The French phrase, "Fat Tuesday" arose from the custom of parading a fat ox through the streets of Paris on this day, a remnant surviving from Roman times when a bull was sacrificed during the festivities. The slaughter of the animal provided the carnival royalty with a bushel of gold.

In 1766, French colonists brought the festival to America, where it has become known as a Southern specialty. Mardi Gras celebrations are held predominately in the South, where the states of Florida and Alabama and parts of Louisiana consider Fat Tuesday a legal holiday. New Orleans boasts the largest and most famous Mardi Gras.

In 1978 Moscow resident Cope Gale witnessed the New Orleans celebration as a volunteer. The next winter while working at Ward Paint and Hardware in Moscow, Gale decided to break the winter blahs by transplanting a small part of the Louisiana Festival to the Palouse. He sported a 20-foot-tall "Grandma" costume while parading in front of his store's window, which had been converted into a puppet show stage.

The following year, according to Moscow Mardi Gras Coordinator Charlotte Buchanan, the invitation became the focal point of Gale and an expanding group of friends who converted Davids' Center into a carnival with food and game booths. A mini-parade was staged, and a small crowd was held in the Center.

The University of Idaho became involved in 1981, when students of David Giese, UI art professor, designed and built floats from white milk carton paper and enlarged the parade.

"It was David who really brought elegance and magic to Mardi Gras," said Buchanan.

Giese also suggested the scheme of black and white for the Mardi Gras colors. The New Orleans Mardi Gras's official colors — purple, green and gold — are credited to the visit of Grand Duke Alexis in 1872. The Russian duke came to New Orleans to hear the Mardi Gras official song, "If Ever I cease to Love," sung by an admired actress.

Buchanan said Moscow's colors were chosen to follow an eighteenth century French Mardi Gras custom of having the populace dress in black and white, thus equalizing the participants' social status.

"You couldn't see the crowds," Buchanan said. "You couldn't see who was rich or who was poor."

She added that the suggested attire also serves the same function in present-day Moscow.

"It's a time to bring together all of the diverse groups of the Palouse," said Buchanan.

That same year Buchanan suggested the addition of off-center wall parade entries to imitate the Dooodah Parade in San Diego. Groups such as the "Mutants," "The Brief Case Brigade," a kazoo band and other assorted non-marching units have enlivened the parade ever since.

The Beaux Arts Ball, a benefit dance for the UI Art Gallery also initiated in 1981. Over 800 people attended the first ball, and each year the profits from the dance have nearly doubled, according to gallery director Kathy Elton. The parade, carnival booths, and community and university involvement have also increased in scope each year.

Last year Moscow's Mardi Gras was covered by PM Magazine and the segment was televised on national television.

"It's a time to bring together all of the diverse groups of the Palouse," said Buchanan.

Student floats occupy time and cooperation

By Alex Voerman
Intern

Saturday's Mardi Gras parade will feature 23 floats constructed by students of David Giese's Creative Process and Design class. The floats will include skulls, dragons and even a giant-sized fire hydrant.

According to Giese, the whole parade originated with his design class five years ago. "The idea behind the float project is to create a collective design problem where students work together as teams," added Giese.

To start off the project, Giese splits the students up into groups of four. The students select a major theme together, and then they individually interpret the theme. The students' interpretations are then integrated together, and the integration serves as a basis for designing the object.

The groups proceed to build small maquettes which are miniature models of the floats to be built, and eventually the large floats are built out of stiff white paper. The entire project must be completed within a two week period. Students have been constructing the floats in one of the Killbuck Dome concourses.

There are many benefits to this type of collective design problem. "Very seldom does one work alone in real life situations, and it is important that students realize the collective design process through which they have to work with and rely on other people," claims Giese. Giese says other benefits are that students recognize the strengths and weaknesses among themselves, they work hard within a relatively short time period, and they are able to actually see their final projects.

Giese selects the people to work in each group. He says that part of the learning process is "working with people you don't necessarily like in order to get things done." He praises the students for their hard work within the two week time period.

The students working on the floats did in fact derive some of these benefits. Said Paul Exline whose group is working on a float which resembles a centaur: "The big thing about this project is learning how to deal with people and establishing a hierarchy of cooperation." Exline went on to comment that he now has a "better understanding of the amount of work involved in building a large scale sculpture," and he has a "more of flavor for working in a monumental scale as opposed to the two-dimensional scale."

Marc Conrey and Doug Cobb are working in a group with two other students on a float which will resemble a dog chasing a fire hydrant. "We started out with a few ideas and they kept changing. The final project ended up being a fire hydrant," said Conrey. One of the things Cobb learned from the float-building project was "how to sort out one's time to meet the (two week) deadline."

As stated previously, all of the floats constructed by Giese's students will be white. One reason for this is that it is much cheaper to not have the added expense of having to buy paint or colored paper. There are, however, more important reasons behind making the floats white according to Giese.

"White is beautiful," says Giese. He adds that "when you score and fold the paper it gives it definition because of the shadow patterns". The white floats also signify the last tribute to winter before the spring hits.

Finally, Giese says that the whiteness fits in very well with the black and white colors of the Beaux Arts Ball.

This year's Mardi Gras parade promises to be very interesting and exciting. The floats built by Giese's students will be of special interest to any parade participants. The students derived many benefits from this collective design project, and the general public can expect a top-notch show at Saturday's parade.

Parade and music colors weekend

White New Orleans is celebrating the Mardi Gras with 200 parades and 60 balls Moscow will be having its own parade and celebrations this week, as well as benefit from the income.

This year the Saturday evening Beaux Arts Ball, a black and white themed event set for Feb. 23, has expanded to three locations from its former single site. The ball will be held simultaneously at the Rathskeller Inn, the Pichard Gallery, and at the Moscow Hotel. Shuttle busses will run between the three locations and the UI Student Union Building throughout the evening.

The ball is held each year to benefit the UI art galleries: The Pichard Gallery in downtown Moscow, and the Campus Gallery located in Beaugreenough Hall on campus.

"Right now, we need community support more than we ever have," said gallery director Kathy Eaton. "The Pichard Gallery is having its downtown spot and will have to relocate after this to a new space," she said.
Organizers recollect weekend's history

Charlotte Buchanan
By Megan Guide
Staff Writer
She has been the driving force behind "the blow-out, 24 hour event" for six years. Charlotte Buchanan, owner and manager of One More Time, is the president of Mardi Gras Inc., a local non-profit organization, consisting of nine board members, responsible for the organization of the Mardi Gras celebration held every year to benefit the University of Idaho Art Department.

"I am the overall coordinator," she said. Buchanan has been involved in the celebration since its birth in 1976. Cope Gale, Jr., then owner of Ward Paint and Hardware, was the originator of the event. "But then it was just a jamboree," she said.

"It was the zaniness of that Mardi Gras that set an example for the others." In 1980, Gale and Buchanan put up $8000 of their own money to have a Mardi Gras for a second year. "It was a time for the arts, theatre and music." This was also the beginning of the Beaux Arts Ball. "The second year," she said, "was when the university tied in."

It was in this year that David Giese, associate professor of art, and current vice president of Mardi Gras Inc., decided the money made from the ball should benefit the University Art Gallery. "David brought the elegance and the expertise of the design students," Buchanan remarked.

"One of the biggest kicks for me is to have an idea and then produce it," she said. The Mardi Gras has grown since the time when it was only held in one building. The all day celebration begins at 7:00 am and ends with the Beaux Arts Ball at night. "We'd like to eventually make this into a three day event," she said. Although Buchanan is the organizer and the "main scrambler" for the event, she said there are many other people who make Mardi Gras happen.

"This isn't just Charlotte," she said. "It's in students making floats. This is a people decorating for the dance. This is the faculty of the Art and Architecture department." The Moscow Mardi Gras is a real team effort.

There are other Mardi Gras. "But the thing that makes ours unique is the university," she said. "The creativity and imagination that goes into this event is remarkable."

Buchanan calls the Mardi Gras her doctorate of human nature. "I like to see how many different kinds of people you can mix up."

She attributes the celebration's popularity to its humor. "I think that humor is one of the best ways to bring people together and art and music help."

David Giese
By Ebenole Gates

David Giese is known by many as a traveller, artist, proponent of humanism, experimenter and more, as one of the centers of Moscow's annual Mardi Gras.

It was in 1985 that Giese, along with David and Mary Ann Moreland, thought of throwing a benefit for the University Art Gallery. That first benefit was called "The Beaux Arts Ball," and was housed in the Moscow Elks Club.

"We wanted to have a celebration outside of athletics which brought the whole community together," said Giese. "This was for all levels of the community, not just specific groups."

Aside from formulating the Beaux Arts Ball concept, Giese has also been the guiding force behind the construction of Mardi Gras parade floats — unique because of their white, monotonous milk carton construction. Giese makes the floats' construction a class activity, students create their own floats and present the finished projects in the Mardi Gras parade.

"What's most amazing," said Giese, "is how four people can get together and put one of these floats together in just two weeks. It really shows the power of collective energy. It's amazing what you can accomplish."

Mardi Gras is definitely one of Giese's favorite times of the year. "I've always liked a good party," he said. "I figure that by the end of February everybody needs a good party."

The Beaux Arts Ball has been known to draw in different types of people of all ages.

"Last year, there was this couple from Lewiston in their fifties. They called and were hesitant. They wanted to know if their costumes would fit in. When I was at the ball someone pointed me out to them. They were incredible. They were dressed as they were in their wedding except she was dressed in the groom's clothes and he was dressed in the bride's gown."

The concept of the Beaux Arts Ball originated with a party thrown to which anyone from any social class could participate. Black and white was worn by all in order that people not be classified by their wardrobes.

Ball holds mask contest

By Stephen Lyons
Features Editor

For all you game show addicts this year's Mardi Grass promises to be a wicked explosion of fun. There are three contests, providing enough excitement to pull any soul out of mid-winter hibernation into the possible lightheartedness of Pulsoke fame.

The Mardi Grass Mask Competition and Sale is already shaping up to be a wonderful demonstration of the quality of creativity not only on the University of Idaho campus, but also in the Pulsok community. Entries have come in from elementary schools, high schools and four UI classes. The deadline is Saturday at 5:30 p.m. at the Moscow Community Center with the actual contest and sale featured between 11 a.m. and 3:30 p.m. Some 100 masks will be displayed and sold with the proceeds going to the Mardi Grass Association and the individual mask designers. The rules are simple. The masks must be handmade from any material. There is no limit to the number of entries but, in keeping with Mardi Grass tradition, the entries must be either black or white, hand held or wearable.

According to Charlotte Buchanan, inspiration for the contest came from "the feeling that we got from the Amadeus, and the wonderful parties and masked affairs that were in the movie. The contest adds to the mystique and magic of the evening. It's time to dust off the musty old boxes, bring out those postcards you've been hoarding and enter the postcard contest. Drop your favorites off at Bookpeople in downtown Moscow by 4:45 p.m. Saturday and they will be promptly judged regional celebration - and wants, eventually, to see the Beaux Arts Ball become an extravaganza housed in the Kibbile Dome. He hopes in the future more campus people help out with construction of floats. Although the process involves putting the decoration on postcards it is worth it. He really is.

Giese said he wants to see Mardi Grass become a major event at 5 p.m. by a distinguished panel of seven. Handmade postcards are welcome and there are seven categories that will be judged. Cope Gale, the past owner of Ward Paints and Hardware, is responsible for the postcard contest. The contest has been a regular feature of Mardi Grass for several years.

While you are still in the mood, you can try for the big money by entering the Mardi Grass Gong Show held at the Kenworthy Theater. The show held on Saturday, will begin at 1 p.m. and continue until 4 p.m. Finals start at 3 p.m. The contest is open to all with talent in comedy, music, dance and drama. Entry forms are available at Hoyt's and Ward Paint and Hardware.

The prizes range from $150 cash to the first place winner to a trip to Moscow by 4:45 p.m. Saturday and they will be promptly judged. The cooperation and involvement by all segments of the community is personally satisfying. "The first couple of years it was hard to get people involved. Certain people we thought would be right for getting involved was too many, we really don't have to sell it anymore. It's a celebration of the community."

Ball hosts live music

By Brad Follans

The "Social Event of the Year" is coming to Moscow this Saturday night. Great bands, fantastic light shows, and superb decorations are going to make this year's Mardi Grass Beaus Arts Ball an event you simply won't want to miss. This will be no ordinary masquerade ball. According to Charlotte Buchanan, president of Mardi Grass Inc., it's the "best way to break out of the blahs of winter...the best party in the Northwest." Five great bands performing at two different locations will feature a variety of danceable music appealing to all age groups. One ten dollar donation ticket (in advance -- they're twelve dollars at the door) will get you into both the Rathskeller's Inn and the Moscow Hotel where this party of the year is being held.

3:00 a.m. and 4:00 a.m. at the Hotel. A shuttle bus will be making stops every few minutes at the SUB on Deacon street, Hotel Moscow, and Rathskeller's to carry partiers from one ball location to the other. Dance portraits will be taken at Rathskeller's by the UI Photo Center and at the hotel by Phoenix.

Decorations for the ball are planned and set up by the College of Art and Agriculture. The theme is Black and White and we can expect to see a complete, quality job. Buchanan said, "We change the whole inside of both of these places. We have the expertise to make this party visually exciting."

Ticket sales, begun last week, have been steady; the Mardi Grass association is trying to raise $10,000 for the UI Art Gallery. Miller Brewing Company is helping to sponsor the ball and has underwritten all of the expenses.

The bands were chosen by submitted tapes and play lists from groups around the area. The Mardi Grass association tried to pick music that would appeal to all the age groups. "The idea is that the music crescendos as the night goes on," said Buchanan. Meaning that early on we'll hear some less
Locally filmed Quest achieves goal

By Lewis Day
Editor
“Filmed on location in…” It’s a nice sound to any community outside possibly, Los Angeles and New York. The phrase means money, jobs and exposure for a community. When the producers of Vision Quest decided to film the screen version of the novel of the same name in Spokane, officials tripped over themselves to welcome the movie crew to town. The novel, about a high school wrestler with the desire to be state champion, was set in Spokane, so it was only natural that the producers decided to film in the city.

Spokane comes off well in the film. it appears as a combination big city/small town. The image is a good one, for that is precisely what Spokane is. The film, much like the city, sends out contradictory messages — at once it is both disarmingly simple and subtly sophisticated. The producers of Vision Quest have taken the very visual ideas of Terry David’s novel and enhanced the feel to make a nice motion picture. Matthew Modine stars as the wrestler whose goal is to become state champion in a new weight class. His struggle to lose weight and keep in shape for the fateful match is chronicled alongside his growing awareness of his first adult love. What starts out as a rather silly and thus unrealizable — inattention develops into a nice love story, of sorts. The melding of the two themes in Vision Quest is handled well; the pacing is fast and despite the film’s essential passivity, the viewer is never bored.

Lindia Fiorentino plays the love interest in Vision Quest. As a young artist — just passing through Spokane — Fiorentino’s character is down on her luck, and just a little too tough. And that’s the very nicest thing about Vision Quest: the characters aren’t even close to perfection, and don’t really strive to be. They are human, with their faults — their many faults — and the film makes no apologies.

Vision Quest has its problems, to be sure. Teen movies, coming of age movies, discovery movies — they all tend to have a moralistic and tiresome urgency; Vision Quest is no different in this respect. Fortunately, however, it is kept to a minimum in Vision Quest, and the result is a teen film that can not only be endured — it can be enjoyed.

The Snake River Six

The Snake River Six started out playing gramehale dances in the late '40s and has evolved into their present band which is limited to a trumpet, trombone, clarinet, banjo, drummer, and bass. They’ve been playing “real” jazz for the last 10 years all around the Palouse.

The Snake River Six played in one of the first Mardi Gras at David’s Center. They weren’t there the following year because mostly rock bands were used. People wrote to the Idahoans in Vision Quest asking for the band which had been at such a hit the year before. Now they’re back in their third Mardi Gras. If you’re planning on hearing some real jazz catch them at the Moscow Hotel from 1:00 to 3:00 p.m., at the Rathskellar’s ball from 7:30 to 10:00 p.m., and then back at the hotel from 10:00 to midnight.

Other bands are playing Thursday night at the hotel from 9:00 to 11:00 and at the Rathskeller from 7:30 to 10:00. There will be a dance on Friday night at the hotel with the band of Yurgen and the Sots. There will also be a dance on Saturday night at the hotel with a dance band and the band of the Snake River Six.

Translations opens

Tonight is opening night of the UI Theater Arts Department's production of Brian Friel's award-winning translation, "Translations.

The play, set in Ireland in 1837, shows the conflicts that arise when British engineers come to perform a geographical survey to improve taxation.

The survey also robs the Irish of their culture by Anglicizing the Irish landmark names.

The play, directed by professor of theatre arts Forrest Sears, also features the unprecedented casting of a member of the UI Theater Arts Staff in a major theatrical role.

Assistant professor of technical theater, Dan Cochran, will play the part of "Owen," an Irishman who has been hired by the British to act as their interpreter.

Ball tickets up
By Douglas Jones
Staff Writer

"Are you going to the Beauch Arts Ball?"

"I don't know ... Ten dollars is quite a bit of money."

If you have been wondering why Moscow's largest "town and gown" celebration is also the most expensive, Charlotte Buchanan and Kathy Ecton have an explanation.

"This is something that has to be explained -- everybody's yelling 'ten dollars for one ticket!'" said Mardi Gras Coordinator Charlotte Buchanan.

"Last year we brought in $8,000, but it cost over $4,000 to put on the Ball. We thought we might bring in $10,000 for the galleries."

Kathy Ecton, director of the University and Pichard Art Galleries and one of the many people who organize and coordinate the Mardi Gras festivities, says that the event has become not only a great way to shake the mid-winter blues, but that it benefits the Idaho Art Center, as the galleries are collectively known.

"Everything we do at the art gallery is free," Ecton pointed out. "The university pays for the heat and lights, but "the money raised from the Ball pays for the exhibits.

"Some times I feel like I should itemize our costs and put it on the door," Ecton said.

Ecton said the costs associated with running both galleries are "astronomical. In March we set the budget for next year's exhibits -- all the shows and displays -- and all that money comes from the money raised from Mardi Gras and the Beauch Arts Ball," Ecton said.

This year Ecton said she would like to see $15,000 come in. If that happens, "and if we spend around the same on Mardi Gras as last year, the galleries will have somewhere around $10,000 to operate on next year."

In the past two years half of all the money raised from the Mardi Gras and the Beauch Arts Ball has had to cover the cost of putting on the events.

This year the ball will be held at two different locations -- Ruthskeller's and the Moscow Garden Lounge. Miller High Life will help underwrite the six bands that will be playing at the ball. There will also be a shuttle that has running between the two ball and the SUB all evening.

"The play has everything: comedy, romance ... and it definitely has this mystery element. To me it really is the stuff of great drama," Sears says.

The set, designed and built by Bruce Brekwall, places the scene inside a barn where, in violation of British law, Gaelic languages and classical literature are taught.

The UI production of Translations is an Idaho premiere, but has been performed in other regional theaters such as Seattle and the Oregon Shakespeare Festival in Ashland.

Brian Friel, who wrote the play in 1980, is considered by Sears to be "the leading contemporary Irish dramatist. He is the successor to O'Casey and Synge, who are the early 20th century Irish dramatists."

Randy Ritz, who plays the leading male role, says "I like dialect. I have an ear for music and Irish is a very musical, so I enjoy it immensely."

Ritz's character, Manus, is a young Irishman who finds himself trying to deal with the loss of his country's language and heritage as well as an involvement in a love triangle.

Translations will show at the Hartung Theatre, Feb. 22-24 and March 1-3. Curtain time each night will be at 8 p.m.

Women crack AP Top 20

By Mike Long
Staff Writer

Rated 20th in the nation by Associated Press International, the Idaho women's basketball team will go up against the Vikings of Portland State tonight at 5:15 and will follow up with the Broncos of Boise State tomorrow, also at 5:15.

The Vandals broke into the AP poll following their 85-79 victory over the Eagles of Eastern Washington last Friday night in the ASU Ribbit Dome. The Vandals now own a 22-1 over-all record and are 8-1 in the Mountain West Conference.

Head Coach Pat Dobratz called the ranking "great," and said: "We've been kind of looking to break into the poll. It just seems like the major newspapers put the emphasis on the AP poll and that's the one that gets circulated.

She feels the publicity will help "people to be aware of us for next year, for recruiting ... even if we happen not to win conference, we'll have an advantage in the recruiting bid."

"We feel fortunate to be in the poll. You see a lot of good teams that aren't mentioned," Dobratz said. "We want to stay in there the rest of the season and I think it helps motivate the players."

She says the ranking has no real effect on the other teams, but their first place conference standing does. "Whoever is number one, you want to knock off."

Prior to the AP rating, the women broke into the United Press International poll and USA Today/CNN. They are currently ranked as 19th in the UPI and 20th by the USA Today/CNN poll.

They will also be able to host the MWC conference play-offs here in Moscow if they are able to overcome (once again) three of their next four opponents. This is why Dobratz calls these upcoming games at home "must wins at home."

"Both of these teams this weekend are scrappy," Dobratz said about Portland State and Boise State. "They're going to be relaxed, really no pressure on them -- so a lot of times, you play your best 'ball then.'

"In the first match-ups with the two earlier in the season, Idaho "got off to terrible starts, they've been starting well as of late and we'll be emphasizing that," Dobratz said.

In was their last first-half against their strongest opponent to date, EWU, the women were able to put in 79 percent or three out of four of their two pointers to finish the evening with an average of 71.9 percent.

"It's going to be hard to top last week's performance, but we'll settle to match it." She is also excited about the improvement in Idaho's rebounding.

The team's major weakness in the beginning of the season appears overcome as they have out-rebounded their last two opponents in a row. Dobratz is content with how the starters are doing and says the girls are up for each game.

Dobratz "feels like each game that we're having some improvement and that we're going to peak at the end of the season. We've got lots to look forward to."

The games will be played prior to the men's at 7:30, who will be going up against Nevada-Reno tonight and NAU tomorrow.

This weekend the Vandal track team visited Portland, OR for the Portland Indoor Invitational. Although they only took eight men for the event, the team performed well.

Doing particularly well for the Vandals were sprinters Dave Smith, Chris Stokes and Everett Vanliss. Vanliss finished best for the Vandals in the 55 yard dash, taking third place. Although Vanliss finished in the best position of the three, Smith broke a Vandal record in winning the preliminaries with a time of 6.27.

Stokes took fifth place in the prelims but did not make the finals, although his time of 6.29 also broke the old record of 6.34. Star decathlete Trond Knaplund did not compete in the meet. Last weekend Knaplund pulled up with a slight bruise of the hamstring and Coach Keller felt it wiser to have him skip the event.

Keller said Knaplund “is coming along slowly and may not compete this weekend.” The Vandals host the Kimmel Athletic Indoor Games this Sunday and expect about 800 college and high school athletes to compete.

At the Portland meet several other Vandals did very well with pole-vaulter Mitch Wolfe and Eric Van Zanten both clearing 15’ and freshman Steve Ott vaulting 15’ 6”.

Tim Taylor set a personal record in the shot-put with a throw of over 58’, but did not place in the meet.

Long distance runners Mark Forster and Mike Rousseau did very well with Forster taking seventh in the mile with a time of 4:13.

Rousseau did not place in the 1000 yard run. Keller was pleased with the hurdle’s time of 2.16 nonetheless.

The Kimmel games this weekend will be the last chance the UI students will have to see the Vandals compete as the team is away for the rest of the track season.

The outdoor season is fast approaching and Keller said that the Vandals will be ready for it. The Big Sky race “will be between Northern Arizona and us.”

The first outdoor meet of the year will be in Pasco, WA for the Eastern Washington University Invitational. This is considered a warm-up to the All-Idaho meet that takes place April 6.

Half the world is hungry for your experience.

Around the world an estimated 800 million people are hungry or starving. And many more that do have food to eat need a more balanced diet. They could.

With your help.

If you have an agricultural, science, or farming experience, or you are a Black corps volunteer, you could help close the food gap, working in developing countries to give people the skills they need to grow their own food.

If you're one of many people who don't believe we're really hungry, I think it's true. But in a way, hunger is a chance to make life better. It's a chance to be part of a world that needs our help. It's a chance to make a difference.
